FOREWORD

The story of Yaśodhara has maintained a sustained captivation for centuries together, with the result that many authors have expended their poetic talents and narrative gifts on the elaboration of it in different languages of our land. The initial motif of the tale is a queen's degrading infidelity to her noble and loving husband who, along with his mother, is finally administered poison by her; and this has been superimposed by the fundamental concepts of Śramaṇic ideology, such as the doctrine of Ahimsā (even in intent), the theory of rebirth, and the inviolable and undiluted moral law that one can never escape the consequences of one's thoughts, words and acts. These and allied concepts have been oft repeated by Jaina authors in all their narratives with a view that the erring man and woman might learn a lesson for the well-being of themselves and of others, both in this world and in the next. The story of Yaśodhara has proved quite suited for propagating these ideas; and naturally, many authors have tried their hands on it.

After the work of Prabhañjana (which is no more available) the most significant Tales of Yaśodhara are the Yaśastilaka of Somadeva (A. D. 959), the Jasahara-cariu of Puṣpadanta (who finished his Mahāpurāṇa in (A. D. 965), and the Yaśodhara-carita of Vādirāja which is being presented in this edition.

Somadeva is well-known for his massive scholarship. His Yaśastilaka, in addition to its literary and stylistic excellences of a prose romance in Sanskrit, is a veritable encyclopædia of a theologian of the middle ages who is out for moral and religious edification. Puṣpadanta's poem attracts us for its composition in the popular Apabhraṃśa dialect, rich in vocabulary and catching on account of its metrical patterns. Vādirāja's kāvyā has its own individuality and striking features. It possesses an artistic unity; its descriptions are proportionate; and its expression is precise, natural and figurative. The arrangement of plot and the flow of narration are masterly; and its moral instructions are effective, often satirizingly slashing at contemporary evils. Vādirāja is seen here as a mature poet. In his flow of poetry, as the Editor puts it: 'Not a word is in excess' and 'the figures of speech come at the poet's bidding.' 'In sheer poetic quality it [i. e., the Pañcāraṭṭī] is second to none in Sanskrit literature; and as the shortest and sweetest Mahākāvya, it is entitled to a singular place in the history of Sanskrit poetry. It is short in compass, modern in theme, and moralistic in tone—a rare combination indeed.' The episodes of rebirths are often looked upon as boring; but they supply opportunities to a resourceful author to multiply his characters, both human and sub-human; and Vādirāja has ably turned them out to his advantage. 'The animals in this poem not only afford entertainment, but also serve to analyse human motive with unerring discernment and act as good commentators on the vanity of life.'

As a result of the researches of various scholars, so studiously summarised by the editor in his Introduction here, we possess now a good deal of definite information about Vādirāja as well as about his date, place and works.

Vādirāja belonged to the Nandi Saṃgha of Jaina teachers. Śrīpāla was his grand-teacher; Matisāgara, his Teacher; and Dayāpala, the author of the Rūpasiddhi on the Sanskrit Grammar of Śākaṭāyana, was his co-student. His residential colony was Simhapura, either modern Singavaram (Dt. Tanjore) or Singatta-kuricchi (Dt. Trichy) in Tamilnāḍu. He was a contemporary, and highly honoured at the court, of the Chālukya king Jagadekamalla Jayasīma II (A. D. 1018 to 1042). The area of his activities lay both in Karṇāṭaka and Tamilnāḍu of the present day, as borne out by literary and epigraphic references to him. Vādirāja has to his credit two Sanskrit poems: the Pārśvanāthacarita (completed in A. D. 1025), the opening verses of which have proved of great referential value, and the Yaśodharacarita. Of his two Nyāya works, the Nyāyaviniścayaavivaraṇa has turned out to be important not only for its logical exposition but also for its having enabled the scholars to reconstruct the original text of Akalaṅka which otherwise was not available; and the Pramāṇanirṇaya is a useful manual. And lastly his Ekībhāvastotra is a hymn in Sanskrit, full of devotion. Vādirāja himself speaks of his eminence as a grammarian, logician, poet and a man of religion. So far, no work of Vādirāja on grammar has come to light. He is lavishly praised both as a poet and as a philosophical disputant by his contemporary and subsequent writers in Sanskrit and Kannaḍa and also in some inscriptions. His various titles as well bear testimony to his outstanding gifts.

Though the Yaśodharacarita of Vādirāja was neatly printed some fifty years back, a more authentic edition of it equipped with the necessary critical accessories and along with a detailed study of Vādirāja as a poet was a desideratum. DR. K. KRISHNAMOORTHY, Karnatak University, has brought out here a critical edition of it which is a model of its kind. The text is critically presented along with the Sanskrit commentary of Lakṣmaṇa (C. 1550 A. D.), neatly edited and published for the first time. The masterly Introduction takes stock of the earlier researches and brings out all the salient facts about Vādirāja and his works. The Yaśodharacarita is thoroughly studied bringing out its position among other works of its kind and presenting a critical estimate of its characters and of its literary qualities in the broad perspective of Sanskrit literature. A detailed study of the Sanskrit commentary has become quite fruitful. DR. K. KRISHNAMOORTHY has undoubtedly given by his thorough study a worthy position to Vādirāja rightly deserved by him in the galaxy of Sanskrit poets.

A continuous presentation of the Sanskrit text without the Sanskrit commentary coming in between, would have been more helpful to the reader of the Yaśodharacarita. May be, in giving the Sanskrit commentary immediately after each verse and in giving a lucid English translation at the end, the editor hopes that the Yaśodharacarita might find a place in the Sanskrit courses of our Universities. I have no doubt that such a hope is justified; and sections from the Yaśodharacarita, on their own merits, can easily take place of a few cantos of the Raghuvamśa of Kālidāsa or some select passages from the Rāmāyaṇa of Vālmīki.

The description of the Mss. of Lakṣmaṇa's commentary seems to be repeated on pp. 3-4 and 77-8 of the Introduction. His suggestion that Kaṭṭagā stands for the river Ghaṭaprabhā need not be easily ruled out ; but can it not be just a Kannaḍa name of the river Kṛishṇā, with the k suffix, i. e. in Sanskrit, Kṛṣṇa (kā) ? Kaṭṭu or Kiṭṭu is a well-known household equivalent of the name Kṛṣṇa in Kannaḍa. Rāmacandra is not a Tīrthaṅkara, but one of the Śalākāpuruṣas in Jaina theology (p. 47 of the Intro.). A thorough orthographical consistency in presenting the Sanskrit commentary would have been more welcome. Often inverted commas put for the quotations are not quite precise, but look like intruders. They could stand better at the close of complete words : rather —nirvāṇam ' ityamaraḥ than —nirvāṇa ' mityamaraḥ (p. 90). These minor points may be attended to in the next edition.

DR. KRISHNAMOORTHY deserves the gratitude of all earnest students of Sanskrit literature for this critical edition of the Yāsodharacarita equipped with a learned Introduction and a careful English Translation of the text.

PREFACE

It was in June 1960 that the need for a critical edition and study of Vādirāja's Yaśodharacarita was first brought home to me by Prof. D. L. Narasimhachar of Mysore in the course of a personal talk; and it received encouragement from my other teachers, Prof. T. N. Srikantiya and Prof. N. Sivarama Sastri, when I broached this idea with them. Sri H. Deveerappa, Director, Oriental Research Institute, Mysore, helped me by getting an authorised transcript of the Ms. in his Institute within a week of my request to him. Dr. P. K. Gode, of the Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute, Poona, was equally considerate in providing me with a transcript of the Poona Ms. I found from Sri K. Bhujabali Shastri's Descriptive Catalogue of Mss. at Mudabidre (South Kanara) several Mss. of the work and wanted to consult them personally. Dr. D. C. Pavate, Vice-Chancellor of the Karnatak University, was good enough to sanction my tour to Mudabidre as part of my official work; and in this connection Dr. S. C. Nandimath, Dr. A. N. Upadhye, Shri K. S. Dharanendraiya, Director of Literary and Cultural Development in Mysore, and the Registrar, Sri S. S. Wodeyar favoured me with kind letters of introduction. At Mudabidre I cannot forget the kindness I received at the hands of Pandit K. Bhujabali Shastri, Jaina Siddhant Bhavan, His Holiness Sri Pārshvakīrti Mahāśwāmigalu of the Dānashālā Matha, Pandit Nagaraja Shastri, the Officer-in-charge of the Mss. Library of the Matha, and Sri Devakumar Jain of the local High School. All these gentlemen spared no pains to make my stay there comfortable and gave me every facility for copying the Parśvanāthacārita: The correct date is 1025 (as stated on page 26) and not 1050 as printed. Readers are requested to make this correction.

Since the erudite Foreword of Dr. Upadhye leaves nothing to be added regarding the nature and value of this work, and since my Introduction dwells at length on the details, I have confined myself to thanksgiving in this Preface. I hope and trust it will be received with sympathy by those interested in Sanskrit learning.

~~INTRODUCTION~~

1. Sanskrit Text

The text of Vādirāja's Yaśodharacarita presented in this work represents the form in which it was known to its only ancient commentator, Lakṣmaṇa, whose commentary is also published here for the first time.

For purposes of recording the variant readings, the following manuscript and printed material has been utilized :—

I. Palm-leaf Manuscripts in the Jaina Dānaśālā Maṭha, Mudabidre (S. Kanara) :—

1. A-No. 703 (with marginal notes in Kannada)
2. B-No. 225 (very old)
3. C-No. 578 (the oldest ; appears to be at least 400 years old).
4. D-No. 767 (some leaves missing at the end)
5. E-No. 205 (quite old)
6. F-No. 816 (about 200 years old)
7. G-No. 799 (ditto)
8. H-No. 132 (ditto)

All these are palm-leaf manuscripts in Kannada characters. None of them, unfortunately, record any date.

II. M-Transcript of a palm-leaf Ms. (in Kannada characters) in the Mysore Oriental Research Institute.

III. P-Transcript of a palm-leaf Ms. in Devanagari, No. 1457 of 1885-92 in the Govt. Manuscripts Library, Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute, Poona.

do not constitute a meaningful word, are not recorded in the footnotes. Even a random comparison of the present edition with the editio princeps will reveal how it is an improvement, and more reliable, in respect of correct readings.

The eight Mss. at Mudabidre seem to be descendants of one and the same family as they show only minor variations. The commentator's readings too confirm to this text tradition. Therefore, while readings of M, P, Ar and T are throughout fully recorded in the footnotes without any omission, only important variants of the rest are noted. The total No. of verses in our Text is 294 (or 295 since in III 6 we have really 2 verses marked 6 a and 6 b) and this comes close to the No. 296 mentioned by Hiralal in describing Mss. in C. P. and Berar (Nagpur, 1926). For other Mss. of the Yāśodharacarita, duly reported, see the Jinaratnakośa (Poona, 1944) P. 319, No. XIV.

2. Sanskrit Commentary

The Sanskrit Commentary of Lakṣmaṇa, published here for the first time is based on the following four Mss., all of them deposited in the Jaina Dānaśālā Maṭha Mudabidre (S. Kanara) :—

1. No. 199 :

size : 19½" × 2".

lines : 8.

letters in a line : 80 to 84.

date : about 300 years old.

condition : Worm-eaten, partly damaged but mostly accurate.

2. No. 812 :

size : $12\frac{1}{2}'' \times 2\frac{1}{4}''$.
 folios : 26.
 lines : 13.
 letters in a line : 52 to 56.
 date : about 200 years old.
 condition : Fairly written with a few spelling mistakes.

3. No. 242 :

size : $13\frac{1}{2}'' \times 1\frac{1}{2}''$.
 folios : 41.
 lines : 8.
 letters in a line : 50 to 54.
 date : about 150 years old.
 condition : good.

4. No. 303 :

size : $19\frac{1}{2}'' \times 2''$.
 folios : 33.
 lines : 8.
 letters in a line : 54 to 58.
 date : about 150 years old.
 condition : very good.

These four Mss. of the commentary, again, look like copies of each other without any significant variants. Hence no variants have been recorded in this edition.

3. Vādirāja's date, place etc.

We may take a brief survey of the research work done by scholars over the last fifty years before we sum up our conclusions :—

The term Vādirāja or ' King of debators ' appears on the face of it to be a title rather than a proper name ; and T. A. Gopinatha Rao¹ put forward the hypothesis that Vādirāja's proper name was Kanakasena, " who, in an inscription (No. 35 Nagar Taluk, Shimoga Dt.), is said to have been the guru of the Ganga King Rāya Rāchamalla and in another of Jayasīṃha Chakravarti (No. 17 Belur Taluk, Hassan Dt.) and that he had for his disciples Oḍeyadeva alias Śrīvijayadeva, Puṣpasena, etc. (No. 35 Nagar Taluk, Shimoga Dt.). ... His disciple Śrīvijaya was the guru of Būtuga Permmadi (No. 17 Belur) who, we know, reigned about 950 A. D. Taking all these facts into consideration, it is certain that Kanakasena Vādirāja lived in the second half of the 10th century A. D. "

It appears indeed strange to us how this editor could have ignored the indubitable piece of internal evidence recorded in the Sanskrit Introduction of the joint editor, Kuppuṣwami Sastri, in the covers of the same book², viz., that one of Vādirāja's works, the Pārśvanāthacarita, was composed in 1025 A. D., and therefore the author was to be assigned to the second quarter of the 11th century.

But the latter, Vādirāja II (or the author of Yaśodharacarita) was the pupil of Matisāgara and a co-pupil of Dayāpāla, the author of Rūpasiddhi (a grammatical treatise illustrative of S'ākaṭāyana-vyākaraṇa) ¹⁰.

According to Hultzschn, Dayāpāla and Śrīvijaya-Oḍeyadeva were pupils of Kanakasena-Vādirāja (I) also.¹¹ This Kanakasena was the family preceptor of Gangas, including Būtuga and Rakkasaganga Permānadi (978 A. D.).¹² He thinks that the above Śrīvijaya-Oḍeyadeva cannot be identical with Oḍeyadeva-Vādibhasiṃha who was a pupil of Puṣpasena, and author of the Kṣatracūḍamaṇi.

Hultzschn believed that Ajītasena-Vādibhasiṃha was a pupil of our Vādirāja (II) ¹³, and a guru of the Yādava king Ereyanga as well as the Sāntara king Tailuga (I) (1103 A. D.).

This overwhelming epigraphical evidence marshalled by Hultzschn was overlooked not only by Hertel but also by Keith who followed Hertel in his account of Vādirāja's Yaśodharacarita. Keith states ¹⁴ :—

“ The Jains naturally enough aimed at vying with the classical epic, and we have in the Yaśodharacarita of Kanakasena Vādirāja, a resident of the Dravida country, whose pupil Śrīvijaya flourished about

A. D. 950, a Kāvya in four cantos with 296 verses. Its contents agree with the Yaśastilaka of the slightly later Somadeva, showing that the tale must have been then current; the two versions differ slightly in content but not in spirit."

Even Dr. P. L. Vaidya has accepted Keith's opinion without verification in his edition of Puṣpadanta's Jasaharacariu (p. 25, Introduction). Sri K. V. Raghava-char has retained the error in his edition of Kannada Yaśodharacarita by Janna (3rd edition, 1961, Mysore, p. xix). Dr. S. K. Belvalkar erroneously identifies Vādirāja with King Jayasimha himself in his Systems of Sanskrit Grammar (p. 72).

The credit of having ably exposed many of the errors in the above statement goes to Dr. A. Venkatasubbiah.¹⁵ In addition to the inscriptional references noted by Hultzsck, Dr. Venkatasubbiah adduces the evidence found in the Prāśasti of Vādirāja (II)'s philosophical treatise—Nyāyaviniścaya-vivaraṇa to prove that our Vādirāja who exclusively held the title of syādvāda-vidyāpati, ṣaṭtarka-ṣaṇmukha and Jagadekamalla-vādin could have written "his Yao dharacarita at some time after 27th October 1025 and before Jayasimha's death in 1042 A. D."¹⁶ He adds — 15. Vādirāja's Yaśodharacarita, ZII. Band 7; Heft 2, p. 179 ff.

The present editor is highly indebted to Dr. A. Venkatasubbiah for the gift of an off-print of this valuable article. The error in question was noticed by Prof. D. L. Narasimhachar also in his article in Kannada on Janna and Vādirāja—Journal of the Kannada Literary Academy, XV. 4.

16. Loc. cit., p. 180.

“ It is true that, as stated by Hertel (loc. cit.), Keith and Hultzsch (loc. cit. p. 697), Śrīvijaya was the disciple of Kanakasena Vādirāja ; but he did not flourish in about A. D. 950 as these scholars have said. Nor did Kanakasena Vādirāja live before 940 A. D. as stated by Hultzsch (p. 696, loc. cit.). For on the one hand, his guru Śrīpāladeva was the contemporary of King Kṛṣṇa (see the Śravaṇa-Belgola inscription No. 67 in Ep. Carnatica, II², p. 25 who has to be identified with the Rāṣṭrakūṭa Kṛṣṇa III (A. D. 945–956 . .) ; and on the other hand, his disciple Śrīvijaya was the guru of the Ganga Princess Caṭṭaladevi, Udaya Sāntara and Barma-Sāntara who made a grant in A. D. 1077 to Śrīvijaya’s disciple Kamalabhadra. ”¹⁷

Another important question discussed by Dr. Venkatasubbiah in the above article is the place of Vādirāja (II) :—

It is true that Kanakasena Vādirāja, Matisāgara and Vādirāja II were all pontiffs (see Hultzsch, loc. cit.) of the Aruṅgalānvaya of the Nandisaṅgha of the Draviḍa-saṅgha (or Draviḍa Gaṇa). But it does not follow therefrom that Kanakasena Vādirāja was a resident of the Draviḍa or Tamil country. For we learn from verse 2¹³ of the Pārśvanāthaprasāsti that Śrīpāladeva, the guru of Matisāgara, was, like his grand-disciple Vādirāja II (see the verse portion...simhapureśvarena rācītā, from the Nyāya-viniścaya-vivarāṇa), the chief of Simhapura; and this indicates that Simhapura was the seat of the pontiffs of this line. Now Simhapura corresponds, as pointed out by R. G. Bhandarkar in his History of the Deccan (Bombay Gazetteer 1896, Vol. I, Part 2, p. 96) to modern Sihur which seems to be a village in the Kannada division of the Bombay Presidency, and it would hence follow that the pontiffs of the above-named line lived in the Kannada country. This is also shown by the fact that epitaphs are found in the Kannada country of some of the gurus of this line who died there. See, for instance, Ep. Carnatica VI, p. 165, which contains the epitaph, incised on rock, of Ajitasena Vādibhasimha who was a disciple of Śrīvijaya, the sadharmā of Vādirāja II; ibid II pp. 23 ff. (Ep. Indica III. 184 ff.), which contain the epitaph of Mallīṣena-maladhāri-deva, who was the disciple of the above-named Ajitasena; ibid. VIII p. 265, which gives the epitaph of Puṣpasena; ibid. III, p. 172 which gives the epitaph of Candraprabha; and ibid. X, p. 220 which gives the epitaph of Guṇasena. All these gurus belonged to the above-mentioned Aruṅga-

18. ' tasmin abhūdadbhuta-saṁnyama-śrīstraividya-vidyādhara-gīta-kīrtiḥ | sūriḥ svayam: Simhapuraika-mukhyaḥ Śrīpāladevo naya-vartmaśālī || '.

We will have occasion to consider this more fully in a later section.

lānvaya of the Draviḍa-saṅgha and their epitaphs are all in the Kannaḍa country." ¹⁹.

The next noteworthy scholar who attempted to give a full account of Vādirāja, his date and works, is Sri Nāthūrām Premi. In his very well documented and authoritative chapter on Vādirāja in his Hindi work — *Jain Sāhitya aur Itihās*²⁰ (pp. 291-299), the only additional investigation we find is of the place Kaṭṭagā-tīra-bhūmi where Vādirāja's Pārēvanāthacarita was composed as expressly mentioned by him in the colophon of that work. He finds it difficult to make out the expression as it is, amends the reading into Kaṭṭagerī bhūmau and explains it as referring to 'Katgeri', now a village and Railway station near Bagalkot (Bijapur District) on the Hubli-Sholapur line²¹. He opines further that this must have been a capital of Jagadekamalla Jayasīṃha.

Nāthūrām Premi also notes for the first time another Vādirāja (III) who succeeded our author in the succession—lists of the same Draviḍa Saṅgha. This last Vādirāja is referred to in two epigraphs at Śravaṇa-Belgola — one of 1125 A. D. and the other of 1200 A. D., and we learn from these that the Hoysala ruler Viṣṇuvardhana gave a village as gift to Śrīpāla Traivīdya, who was posterior to Vādirāja II in the same guruparamparā and who was the guru of Vādirāja III ; and when Śrīpāla died, his pupil Vādirāja III got a temple of Jina constructed in his memory. In a footnote the learned author notes that this last Vāḍirāja was the guru of the Ganga king Rācamalla IV or Satyavākya.²²

The identifications of Simhapura and Kaṭṭapūra-blūmi proposed by the above scholars seem to us entirely unwarranted. There are indeed quite a number of 'Simhapuras' already recorded in ancient Indian geography, e. g., one in the Punjab identified by Cunningham with Katās in the District of Jhelum,²³ one referred to by Hiuen Tsang on the Western bank of the Indus as a dependency of Kashmir,²⁴ the one mentioned in the Mahābhārata as conquered by Arjuna²⁵ and the one famous in Jaina Purāṇa. We are not concerned here with any of these because they are not in any way proximate to the territories of Jagadekamalla Jayasimha. Dr. Venkatasubbiah quotes the authority of R. G. Bhandarkar to identify our author's Simhapura with modern Sihur, "in the Kannada division of the Bombay Presidency". But this is all erroneous because Bhandarkar has nowhere in his book located Sihur "in the Kannada division of the Bombay Presidency", but only said that linguistically 'Sihur' is a modernisation of the form 'Simhapura'. The identification is thus only Dr. Venkatasubbiah's, and it is not borne out by facts. According to the Bombay Gazetteer, 'Sihor' is a town in Gujarat or present Saurāṣṭra and not in Karnataka. This is also corroborated by the Palitana plates of Dhruvasena I (Valabhī) dated 529 A. D.² The identification thus does not help us and we must look to other Simhapuras.

Despite the fact that Karnataka formed the centre of our Vādirāja's literary activity, we have other references which indicate that Simhapura was situated in the Tamil country. For instance, the following is the colophon of Belgola-Paṇḍitavarya alias Cārukīrti's work, Gītavirāga, a Ms. of which has been noticed by Pandit Bhujabali Śāstri :—

Drāviḍadeśaviśiṣṭe simhapure labdhajanmāsau ।

Belgola-paṇḍitavaryaḥ cakāra śrīvr̥ṣabhanāthavara-caritaṁ ॥

It is specifically stated herein that the above author who had settled down in Śravaṇa-Belgola was born in 'Simhapura of the Tamil country'. This, taken in conjunction with the 'Draviḍa Saṅgha' and 'Aruṅga-lānvaya' of our author, will point to a place only in Tamilnad as his plausible home-town.

In Tamilnad, too, there are epigraphical references to more than one 'Singavaram' :—

1. Singavaram in the Gingee Taluk of the South Arcot District. Singapurantālu included Nerkunam and Vedal in the Wandiwash Taluk of the North Arcot District and Tayanur in the Tirukkoyilur Taluk of the S. A. district.²³

2. Singavaram in the Arantangi Taluk of the Tanjore District.
3. Singatta-kuricchi (between Mattur and Mandayur) in Kulathur Taluk of former Pudukkottai state, now in Trichy District.²⁴

Though Pandit Bhujabali Sastri would identify Simhapura with the first Singavaram, we think that the following important consideration is a sure indicator of only one of the last two as the home-town of our Vādirāja. We quote in extenso from an interesting study by Sri K. R. Venkataraman 'The Jainas in Pudukkottai'²⁵ :—

"The Chettipatti temple, or more correctly, group of temples, is now being excavated The excavations have so far brought to light the moulded plinth and basements of three shrines... Two inscriptions have been discovered on the mouldings of the central shrine. In one of them are fragments of the prāśasti of Rājarāja I

28. South Indian Inscriptions, Vol. XII (Madras, 1943) p. 117.

An epigraph, No. 115, records the grant of Candrāditya, a Pallava prince of the time of Mahendravarman or Narasimhavarman I at Simhapura, of Śiva temple — p. 54 (Ibid).

Pandit Bhujabali Sastri, however, writes that this is Singavaram in the Tiṇḍivanam Taluk of the South Arcot District — Loc. cit. p. 64.

29. For the details of these two places, I am indebted to the courtesy of my friend Dr. P.B. Desai and Sri B. R. Gopal of the Archaeological Department.

and in the other the following fragments in Tamil—udaya-matisāgara-aruhar-ācāryar-ippalli.

- Matisāgarar in this connection may be identified with the Matisāgara, the guru of Dayāpāla who composed the Hitarūpasiddhi and Vādirāja. These were great Jain teachers of the 10th century “who challenged rival religionists”.

Now, these refer to excavations in Pudukkottai State; and we have a clear record here of the ippalli or residential colony of Matisāgara, the undisputed teacher of our Vādirāja (both by internal and external evidence). So we are within reasonable bounds when we guess that Vādirāja's home-province was also Tamilnad, and his home-town Simhapura was situated somewhere close to the Pudukkottai state.⁵¹ When we take into consideration the fact that several Mss. of our author's Yasodharacarita were found preserved in the Tanjore District, though Jainism there today is not very flourishing, we may narrow down our uncertainty and tentatively conclude that the home-town of Vādirāja was the second Singavaram mentioned above, the modern town of that name in the Arantangi Taluk of the Tanjore District.

The other problem we saw regarding Kaṭṭagāṭira-bhūmi may, fortunately, be disposed of more easily. For in old Kannada literature the name Gaṭṭage is quite familiar as the name of the river Ghaṭaprabhā³² (a tributary of the Kṛṣṇā River). For example, Ranna who was Kavi-cakravarti in the court of the earlier Western Cbālukya king Tailapa (973-997 A. D.) says —

*arikeya gaṭṭageyūṃ per-doreyūṃ parivalli Taddavāḍige teṅkal ṽ toragalige baḍagalirdudu nereye sukhodḍipamenisi belugalideśam ṽ*³³ referring to both Kṛṣṇā and Ghaṭaprabhā Rivers by the names Perdore and Gaṭṭage respectively. It is abundantly clear that Sanskrit Kaṭṭagā-ṭira-bhūmi is nothing but a reference to a place on the River Ghaṭaprabhā, Khaṭṭagā or Kaṭṭagā being only a Sanskritisation of the popular form Gaṭṭage. The proposed emendations in the reading of the text are un-called for. Moreover, 'Katgeri' the village was never a capital city of Jagadekamalla Jayasimha whose only capital towns known to history are Kollipake and Poṭṭalakere.³⁴ And Vādirāja's colophon, too, only refers to 32. The river also seem to have been known by the name of Khaṭvāṅgā in the Purāṇa — Vide Hindi article on Gomanta-Parvata in "Bhāratīya Anuśīlan", p. 15.

33. Ranna, Ajita-tīrthakara-purāṇa-tīlaka (in Old Kannada), XII. 46.

34. Vide — Fleet, Dynasties of the Kanarese Districts (Bombay, 1882) p. 43f. Another capital of his that we know is Yetagiri (Modern Yadgir) vide — B. R. Gopal, JIH. Dec. 1959, p. 267f.

the kaṭaka or army-camp of Jagadekamalla on Kaṭṭagātīra-bhūmi, and not to any capital residence.

We are now in a position to conclude with a fair degree of certainty that though there are several Vādirājas in Sanskrit literary history³⁵ and Jain guru-paramparā-s in general, and the Draviḍa Saṅgha-Arunga-lānvaya in particular, the author of the Yaśodharacarita is by far the most widely known and that

- (1) he should not be confused with Kanakasena, his senior guru.
- (2) he was honoured at the court of Jagadekamalla Jayasīṃha II (1018 to 1042 A. D.) as a great vādin or Debator and held the exclusive titles—Jagadekamallavādin, syādvāda-vidyāpati, and ṣaṭtarka-ṣaṇmukha.
- (3) he completed in that royal court, before writing his Yaśodharacarita, another work of his, to wit, the Pārśvanāthacarita in the year 1050 A. D.
- (4) though his main field of activity was in Karnataka, his residential colony was in Siṃhapura of Tamilnad.

We have already incidentally referred to a large number of epigraphs and praśasti-s which have a bearing on Vādirāja's date and place. In the next section, we propose to quote at length the Sanskrit text of the outstanding ones among these, a perusal of which will show how Vādirāja was a recipient of superlative praise both as a poet and as a philosophical disputant, from his contemporaries and successors alike. But before we close this section we have to note here that a Kālāmukha Śaiva (or ' Lakuliśa-panḍita ') teacher, by name Vādirudraṅga is eulogised in an inscription³⁶ as having vanquished, among others, Vādirāja himself in debate. The epigraph is dated 1036 A. D. and can have a reference only to our Vādirāja :—

... abhaya-candra-kālānalaṁ,
Vādibhasimha-śarabhaṁ, Vādirāja-mukhamulraṁ. . .

This has been already noted by Prof. Handiqui, in his monumental work, *Yaśastīlaka and Indian Culture*³⁷ to which we shall have occasion to refer more extensively in our later sections. One more point he has made which is relevant here is :—

“ Śrutasāgara in his commentary on Yaśastīlaka 2, 126 quotes a statement which represents Somadeva as saying that both Vādirāja and Vādibhasimha are his disciples.³⁸ The statement, cannot, however, be traced in the two extant works of Somadeva, and neither Vādirāja nor Vādibhasimha claims Somadeva as his guru in any of their works. ...it is not chronologically impossible for Vādirāja and Vādibhasimha to be regarded as disciples of Somadeva.”³⁹

36. Epigraphia Carnatica, Shimoga, Pt. I. Shikaripur Taluk. No. 126.

37. Ibid., p. 347.

38. sa vādirājo'pi śrīsomadevācāryasya śiṣyaḥ ;
' Vādibhasimho'pi mādiyaśiṣyaḥ
Śrīvādirājo'pi mādiyaśiṣyaḥ ' ityukta tvācca.

39. Loc. cit., p. 9.

At the end of the paragraph, Prof. Handiqui himself adds the caution :-

“ But, nevertheless, it is strange that they should be so completely silent about their early guru Somadeva ”, which is to be supplemented by another difficulty in the way of accepting the tradition, viz. that “ Śrutasāgara’s statement...is not confirmed by any other contemporary source ; and it cannot be forgotten that Śrutasāgara comes very late, long after all these authors. ” as ably pointed out by Dr. A. N. Upadhye.⁴⁰ It was Hultzsch who first noticed this reference by Śrutasāgara ; but he gave full credence to it, and even tried to use it as a sheet-anchor to determine other dates in his article on ‘ the story of Jivandhara ’ (QJMS. XII. 4, p. 317 ff.).

The subjects of the king are represented by the disputants, and his parasol by Vādirāja's fame. For the king's chauri-s the author discovered an equivalent in Vādirāja's speeches, which, like the former, were near the ears, because they proceeded from the mouth, and which resembled the former in whiteness because they exposed the teeth". Before we pass on to the next verse, the momentous implications of the puns of this verse are well worth a notice. Under the guise of Jinastuti, the accomplished poet is praising not only his worthy predecessors like Pūjyapāda, Samantabhadra, Akalaṅka and Vidyānanda, but also teachers like Kanakasena and Matisāgara, and what is most important, his senior contemporaries like Anantavīrya and Dayāpāla. The only two intriguing names we are still left with are Vādirāja and Narendrasena. We think it highly unlikely that the author is indulging in self-praise here. Even to take it as an epithet of either Akalaṅka who precedes, or Samantabhadra who follows, the expression, is not to our liking because it goes against the procedure uniformly adopted by the poet in the verse. Nor, on the face of it, can it be taken to refer to Kanakasena-Vādirāja I, in the Draviḍa Saṅgha Aruṅgalānvaya because he has already been referred to by the name Kanakasena. This poses a problem before us; and similarly, the single name Narendrasena in the verse poses another problem inasmuch as it is an unfamiliar name in the succession lists of Draviḍa Saṅgha-Aruṅgalānvaya already discussed at length by us.

Both these difficulties can be satisfactorily solved by taking the names of both Kanakasena and Narendrasena in this verse to refer to the contemporary renowned teachers of the Candrakavāṭānvaya (or Senānvaya) of Mulgund and not to teachers of the Draviḍa Saṅgha. In that case, the word Vādirāja can easily designate our author's teacher in the guruparamparā (of Draviḍa Saṅgha-Aruṅgalānvaya) namely, Kanakasena-Vādirāja I. That Narendrasena of the Candrakavāṭānvaya was an exceptionally worthy grammarian is known from inscriptions.⁵³ In this connection, it is interesting to note how Dr. Barnett, while first editing the Mulgund Inscriptions⁵⁴, fell into the error of identifying Kanakasena (i. e. Vādirāja I in our terminology), the guru of Śrīvijaya, with Kanakasena of the Candrakavāṭānvaya⁵⁵ because both of them were living about the same time. Our proposed solution thus will help in determining the literary celebrities referred to by the poet Vādirāja.

But some Mss. collated for the purpose of this edition contain two verses of praśasti as noted in our footnotes on the last page of the Sanskrit printed text. The Madras Catalogue records that one of these verses viz., kāṇādaḥ etc., is found in a Madras Ms. too, viz., No. 12164, Op. cit. Vol. XXI, p. 8138. This verse has also been recorded in an inscription — EC. IV. No. 100 ; p. 52. So we note the two verses and translate them here as representing a fairly ancient tradition. Perhaps, originally they formed only inscriptional verses, or popular dicta and later found their way into the colophon of the Yaśodharacarita.

There are some variants of the last word like trṇoti in the Madras Ms. But though unfamiliar and jarring on the ear, this is a grammatically correct form as noted even by Abhinavagupta in his Dhvanyāloka-locana while illustrating the defect of cacaphony (śruti-kaṣṭa). Vide — “śruti-kaṣṭastu 'adhūksīt,' 'akṣotsīt,' 'trṇedhi' ityādi” — Ibid. p. 214 (Benares Edn. with Bālapriyā).

“ Honey, sugar, and all such things will taste sweet only so long as the dulcet strains of Yaśodhara’s Tale, composed by Vādirāja, have not filled the ears of the listeners with delight ! ”

(d) Praise of Vādirāja by later poets.

Lakṣmaṇa, whose commentary on the Yaśodharacarita is published in this edition, prefaces his comment on each canto with one or more invocations to Vādirāja. We leave them out of account here, as they can be easily referred to by opening the relevant pages.

Judging by the number of Jaina authors in Sanskrit later than Vādirāja, and Vādirāja’s own dazzling personality as borne out by the records we have so far seen, it is but reasonable to expect a large number of later references in his praise. But the present editor, who could not undertake the task of consulting all later references to Vādirāja, more due to lack of requisite facilities than lack of enthusiasm, has to leave this section as it is. It is hoped that some other scholar will help him some time to make good this deficiency.

Nonetheless, it appears to the present editor that such references in Sanskrit may not be many after all. On the other hand, in old Kannada literature, wherein we do not expect to find much by way of tribute to a Sanskrit writer—in fact, even Janna who is indebted heavily to Vādirāja in his Kannada work, Yaśodharacarite, does not stop to mention the name of this worthy predecessor—we do come across echoes of Vādirāja's praise, more than once, in the works of great Kannada Jaina poets. These are recorded below, with translation into English. May this not suggest that the popularity of Vādirāja was more in the South than in the North, more in Karnataka than in other provinces?

5. Life of Vādirāja

From the material furnished in the previous section, we get a clear picture of the outstanding personality of Vādirāja, both as a poet of repute and as a philosopher of prestige. His resounding triumphs against redoubtable rivals in philosophy in the grand court of the Chālukyan Emperor, Jagadekamalla (I), had become legends in the land's literary history. There was no end to the laurels he won from his royal patron who was so pleased with him, and no rival who challenged him in a debate and was not worsted. Vādirāja's supreme felicity of expression, incisive force of argument and infinite mastery over Jaina theology, won for him such distinguished titles as Jagadekamalla-vādin, ṣaṭ-tarka-ṣaṇ-mukha, and syādvāda-vidyāpati. Though a divine, Vādirāja's contribution to literature was conspicuous and all his three major works, viz., the Pārśvanāthacarita, the Nyāya-viniścaya-vivarāṇa and the Yāsodharacarita were written during the reign of his royal patron Jagadekamalla, possibly with a view to the King's education, as expressly stated in the colophon of the philosophical treatise. All these three works, including the Yaśodharacarita, contain overt or covert references to Jayasimha Jagadekamalla. The last verse in Canto III of the Yaśodharacarita, for instance, speaks of the reign of King Yaśomati in the poem in terms suggestive of Jayasimha—

‘ vyātanvan jayasimhatām raṇamukhe
dīrgham dadhau dhārīṇīm rājā so’pi yaśomatiḥ pravilasat-sāmrājyalakṣmīpatiḥ ’ || ’

Again, in the last but one verse in Canto IV, we have :

‘ adhigata-nayasindhuh satyasandhaḥ sa rājā
raṇamukha-jayasimho rājyalakṣmīm babhāra. ’

This literary tradition of identifying an epic hero with a contemporary king was very much in vogue in Old Kannada poetry as instanced by foremost poets like Guṇavarma, Paṃpa and Ranna. Vādirāja, naturally enough, imbibed it and used it in his own way. But in the other works of his, as we already noted, references to the royal patron are quite explicit.

From all this we can conclude that Vādirāja, though born and educated in Tamīlnad, made Karnataka the home of his activity, under the royal patronage of King Jayasimha II. He must have had intimate acquaintance with Jaina luminaries at the Gaṅga court like Śrīvijaya, and others nearer the Chālukyan capital like Kanakasena and Narendrasena, as evidenced by the epigraphs. We are singularly lucky in having so many inscriptions that throw light on several aspects of Vādirāja's imposing personality.

Vādirāja himself has informed us that Matisāgara, Hemasena ⁶³, and Dayāpāla ⁶⁴ were all his teachers and they were no more when he penned his magnum opus, the Nyāya-viniścaya-vivarana :—

smṛtyābhirakṣantu mām ॥ ⁶⁵

We have already noted the reference to Vādirāja's another guru Kanakasena. ⁶⁶ All these teachers were Digambaras who hailed from the Nandi Saṅgha (or gaṇa) of the Draviḍa Saṅgha-Arungalānvaya and their succession was kept alive in places like Humcha. ⁶⁷ All 63. We cannot take as conclusive Dr. Venkatasubbiah's identification of Hemasena with Dhanañjaya, author of Dvisandhāna. cf. JBRAS, N. S., 3, 1928. p. 156 f.

64. We have seen that the inscriptions speak of Dayāpāla only as a senior co-student (sadharma) of Vādirāja.

66. A second reference to Kanakasena noted in the Index of the work in question (NVV) is not traceable by me in the body of the text.
67. One more epigraph from Sompur (Hassan) which refers to these teachers may be noted here — Mysore Archaeological Report, 1926, p. 49. The list here is given as — Śrīpāla — Hemasena — Dayāpāla — Śrīvijaya — Śāntideva — Puṣpasena — Cakravarti Vādirāja — Śāntadeva.

All these lists do not agree in details. But the reference to Vādirāja here as 'Cakravarti Vādirāja' is significant and is a sure pointer to our author.

these have written outstanding books, of which only Dayāpāla's Rūpasiddhi is known at present.⁶⁸

Nāthūrām Premī records a tradition embodied in Devasena's Darśanasāra that the above Saṅgha in the South was frowned upon by orthodox Jainas as pseudo-Jaina (Jainābhāsa), inasmuch as they held land and property, took to agriculture and business.⁶⁹ We are not sure whether this is not a later idea in view of the uniform esteem and admiration which Vādirāja compelled from his contemporaries as we saw above.

The same writer also records a story about Vādirāja⁷⁰ :— It appears Vādirāja was a leper and that when enquiries were made at court regarding this, his pupil lied and gave out that he was perfectly healthy. Someone took up a challenge then, and the king himself undertook to investigate it. The pupil was in fright and ran to his teacher to report what had happened. The teacher pacified him and easily became free from his fell disease instantaneously by composing the religious hymn, Ekībhāvastotra.

As the learned writer judiciously remarks, the story, despite the support it derives from Candrakīrti's commentary, is hardly credible. It only illustrates the later-day flair for investing teachers with all conceivable miracles. In Sanskrit literary history, we have such stories about Kālidāsa, Bāṇa and Mayūra, which do not stand any historical examination.

It is not clear whether this Matisāgara and the guru of Vādirāja are identical.

An incomplete Mss. of Rūpasiddhi is preserved in the Library of the Oriental Research Institute, Mysore.

Jayasimha, the royal patron of Vādirāja, is by no means known to history as a Jaina by persuasion. He must have practiced religious toleration as a state policy. Otherwise we would not have had so many of his charters and gifts of land made over to Brahmins, Śaivas, etc., as evidenced by a large number of his inscriptions. Dr. S. C. Nandimath has ably established how the Western Chālukya rulers were only descendants of the Bādāmi Chālukyas, and their hereditary religion was not at all Jainism.⁷¹ It therefore redounds to the singular credit of Vādirāja that he could almost assume the office of royal preceptor and win the highest tributes from a non-Jaina king, all by dint of his personal merit only.

Vādirāja must have thus lived an active life in Karnataka, participating prominently in all philosophical 71. S. C. Nandimath, Chālukyas of Bādāmi and Kalyāṇa QJMS, Vol. XLVIII, p. 22. This article also shows that Jagadekamalla Jayasimha was the brother of Vikramāditya and that both these were sons of Daśavarma and Bhāgyavati. Daśavarma was the brother of Satyāśraya, son of Taila (married to Jākabbe) who wrested the throne from the Rāṣṭrakūṭas.

Bilhaṇa, the court poet of Jayasimha's grandson, Vikramāditya VI, paints both Vikramāditya and his father Āhavamalla (i. e. son of Jayasimha) as votaries of Śiva.

The Kannada Basavapurāṇa states that Jayasimha's Queen Suggaladevi was initiated into Viraśaivism by Devara Dāsimayya. cf. Indian Antiquary, Vol. VIII. pp. 10-21; Fleet, Dynasties of the Kanarese Districts, p. 43f.

assemblies of the day, winning many a glory at court and devoting his time to the propagation of Jaina thought by means of learned works, popular poems and religious discourses. He was a hero of many wordy battles and a poet of immortal poems. His life has remained a legend, and his poem Yaśodharacarita has remained a popular classic down the ages, judging by the number of Mss. available throughout India. His work inspired the Hoysala King's Kavicakravarti, Janna to wit, to write a similar Yaśodharacarite in Kannada; and perhaps much earlier, an unknown poet in Tamil to compose the Yaśodharakāvyaṃ.⁷²

6. Works of Vādirāja

We are quite certain of Vādirāja's authorship of three works, two poetical, and one philosophical, as already indicated. Since the Yaśodharacarita will be treated independently in a later section, a brief sketch of the others is provided below. Other works ascribed to him will also be indicated :—

72. Titles like Vādībhasinīha and Vādirāja appear to have been very much in vogue in Karnataka since very ancient times. Even Jinasena refers to a Vādisinīha. There is a plate which purports to record events of 247-8 A. D. edited by Burnell (South Indian Paleography, 2nd ed. p. 34) which refers to the titles of Vādimadagajendra and Vādībhasinīha. Though Rice accepts it as genuine (Mysore and Coorg), Fleet regards it as a forgery of not earlier than the 10th century A. D.

It is indeed a pity that in the present state of scholarship we are not in a position to determine the personal name of this author precisely, if 'Vādirāja' is held to be only a title. However, we can demarcate this Vādirāja from others quite precisely. '-sūri' and '-deva' are only appellations denoting a divine, and these are omitted from mention in our references.

(A) Pārśvanāthacarita

This is a literary epic in twelve cantos describing the different births, culminating in the attainment of perfection, of Saint Pārśvanātha, the twenty-third Tīrthamkara. In characteristic Mahākāvya tradition, it creates occasions to describe triumphs in battle, victorious marches of armies, love and beauty. The author exhibits his skill in the manipulation of difficult sound-effects and acrostics in a whole canto, viz., the Seventh. There is not much of a connected story, and characterisation is inconspicuous from the strictly literary point of view. But it must be remembered that it is a sacred poem, a Purāṇa in truth, modelled on the relevant cantos in Guṇabhadra's Uttarapurāṇa; and does succeed in investing an atmosphere of religious awe and grandeur to the figure of the hero in the last cantos.

The titles of the different cantos are :—

- I. Aravinda-mahārāja-saṅgrāma-vijaya,
- II. Svayamprabhāgamana,
- III. Vajraghoṣa-svarga-gamana,
- IV. Vajranābha-cakravarti-prādurbhāva,
- V. Vajranābha-cakravarti-cakra-prādurbhāva,
- VI. Vajranābha-cakravarti-prabodha,
- VII. Vajranābha-cakravarti-digvijaya-vyāvarṇana,
- VIII. Ānanda-rājyābhinandana,
- IX. Digdevī-paricarana,
- X. Kumāra-carita-vyāvarṇana,
- XI. Kevala-jñāna-prādurbhāva,
- XII. Bhagavannirvāṇa-gamana.

These Canto-headings cannot convey how the poet has taken special pains to infuse a human interest into his varied characters, especially when they are tossed by lust and hate in the ocean of samsāra. Even a casual reader cannot miss the general preference of Vādirāja for the straight and the direct instead of the involved and the cumbrous in matters of style. But, when approached from the purely secular angle, the poem might fail to hold the reader's interest. It presents a complete contrast in this respect to his later and maturer work, Yaśodharacarita, which has proved so popular to all tastes.

Though it bears some marks of immaturity, and though it is not free from pedantry and artificiality in places, yet the Pārśvanāthacarita repays the perusal of modern scholars because of the large number of predecessors explicitly referred to by Vādirāja. Beside the ancient dignitaries, viz., Umāsvāti, Gṛdhraṇḍī, Samantabhadra, he also finds occasion to praise masters like Akalaṅka, Vādisimha, and Jinasena, besides alluding to later authorities like Anantavīrya, Viśeṣavādin and Vīranandin. These references to authors and accounts of their works, though short, have proved of great value in fixing the chronology of many an old Jaina writer.

(B) Nyāya-viniścaya-vivaraṇa

This is by all means the magnum opus of Vādirāja which reveals his mastery over all the schools of philosophy in general and over the school of syādvāda in particular. Since the work was not published till recently, it could not attract the attention of the historians of Indian Logic who wrote their works in the beginning of this century. But due to its quality and excellence, depth of philosophical insight and sharpness of logical acumen, its extracts from very important, but now extinct, works in Indian philosophy and refutation of the Buddhist theories as developed by Dharmakīrti, Arcāṭa, Dharmottara, etc., this work of Vādirāja is bound to find sooner or later its honoured place in the galaxy of Sanskrit philosophical classics.

Though it professes to be only a commentary on Akalaṅka's logical text Nyāyaviniścaya, the Vivaraṇa of Vādirāja—also known as Vivaraṇālāṅkāra after the manner of Dharmakīrti's work; and Vyākhyānaratnamālā as noted in the colophon—has the weight and authority of a full-fledged bhāṣya comparable to Śaṅkara's on the Brahmasūtras. It sets out the diverse theories of the adversaries, the Buddhists being the foremost among them, in their own words and then refutes them from the point of view of Jaina Logic.

In this connection, we cannot do better than quote from the valuable 'Foreword' to this work by Dr. Satkari Mookerjee :—

“The Nyāyaviniścaya, as is apparent from the very title of the book, is a work on Jaina epistemology that I have had the good fortune to study. The Commentary of Vādirājasūri on the Nyāyaviniścaya seems to me the most elaborate, exhaustive and comprehensive of all. The language and the arguments of Vādirājasūri are admittedly exceedingly abstruse and incisive. The value of this work is particularly augmented by the elaborate criticism of Dharmakīrti's Pramāṇavārttika and the exposition of Prajñākaragupta ... This work, though primarily it professes to be the exposition of the Jaina logical tenets, has a super-added value as the faithful exposition and elaborate critique of all the tenets of the Buddhist this kind of very interesting vāda from Vādirāja. In the following lines Vādirāja is silencing Arcata⁷⁸, the Buddhist logician—

*arcata-caṭaka tadasmāduparama dustarka-pakṣa-bala-calanāt |
syādrādācala-vidalana-
cūmcurṇa tarāsti nayacañcuḥ ||* (p. 449)

‘ Oh, sparrow of an Arcata ! Stop flapping your wings of bad argument ! Indeed, you do not have the strong beak of reasoning to pierce the mountain of Jainism ! ’

Vādirāja’s work which consists of only three sections (known as prastāvas) — Perception (Pratyakṣa), Inference (Anumāna) and Testimony (Pravacana)—runs to about a thousand pages of close print in super-royal size !

(C) Ekibhāva-stotra

This is a devotional hymn popularly sung by Jainas even to-day. It contains 25 verses in the Mandākrāntā metre and breathes pure devotion. Its lyrical fervour and popularity cannot be gainsaid ; but as we already noted, not all Mss. contain the colophon mentioning the name of Vādirāja. There is a reference in one of the verses to Jīvaka (or Jivandhara) and even this is not enough to confirm the ascription beyond a shadow of doubt. As in the case of stotras ascribed to Śaṅkara, Kālidāsa, etc., one can never be sure of the authenticity of this stotra either. The test of verbal correspondence too is inapplicable and indecisive. For aught we know, it may be this Vādirāja, or some later Vādirāja, or only some anonymous poet fathering his own composition on an ancient celebrity, that is responsible for the mellifluous Ekībhāvastotra.

(D) Pramāṇa-nirṇaya

This work on Jaina Logic has been published from Bombay⁷⁹ in the name of Vādirāja. Unlike Nyāya-viniścaya-vivaraṇa, it is in the nature of a very short manual for the use of beginners with four chapters :

- I. Pramāṇa-lakṣaṇa-nirṇaya (Critique of Definition)
- II. Pratyakṣa-nirṇaya (Critique of Perception)
- III. Parokṣa-pramāṇa-nirṇaya (Critique of Indirect Means of Proof)
- IV. Āgama-nirṇaya (Critique of Testimony).

At the end of each chapter we find that the author claims to have based his exposition on the works of 'Deva' or Akalaṅka.⁸⁰ But no specific references are there to any other worthy predecessor. The published edition is based on a single Ms. and the only clue to authorship is supplied by the colophons at the end of each chapter which simply state—without any of his titles.

“ iti śrīmadvādirājasūripranīte ”

But Dr. A. N. Upadhye has made the following note in his personal copy of this text, which I had occasion to use, thanks to his kindness :—

79. Published in MDJG in the year V. S. 1974.

80. Cf. (i) devasya matamudvīkṣya (I, last verse).

(ii) yanirūpitam devaiḥ tasyātra saikṣepānnirṇayo varṇito mayā (II, last verse).

(iii) ... devasya drṣtvā matam ... (III, last verse).

“The Delhi Ms. in Kannada characters, which Pt. Pannalal sent to me for inspection, gives the colophon thus—“iti lakṣaṇanirṇayaḥ”. Thus it does not mention the name of Vādirāja. This Ms. is called Pañcaprakaraṇa, contains complete text of Pramāṇa-parikṣā of Vidyānanda, and incomplete text of Pramāṇa-nirṇaya. There is one Ms. of Pramāṇa-nirṇaya elsewhere ; its relation with Vādirāja’s work has to be seen.”

This is a very important scholarly note, and until corroborated by further Ms. evidence, we will not be right in taking this work as a genuine composition of Vādirāja, particularly in the absence of his name in the body of the work itself (since in the genuine works his name does occur in the body of the work). If it ultimately turns out to be a genuine work, it will have to be regarded as a summary of the author’s larger logical work for the benefit of beginners.

(E) Kākutstha-carita (?)

Before we close this section, we have to consider in some detail the possibility whether Vādirāja might have composed a work of this name, though it is no longer extant today, because he expressly declares, in Yāśodharacarita, I. 6, as follows :—

‘śrīpārśvanāthakākutsthacaritaṃ yena kīrtitaṃ ...’

The question is whether Vādirāja is referring to one or two works herein. Pt. Nāthūrām Premi, in the first edition of his Itihas, Dr. Vaidya, Prof. Velankar and other scholars have been writing that ‘Kākutsthacarita’ was a poem different from ‘Pārśvanāthacarita. But Premi in the second edition of his book⁸¹

81. Loc. cit. footnote, p. 297.

a later Vādirāja, son of Pomarāja, since the last verse therein tells as much.

7. Yāśodharacarita, a study

(i) Synopsis of the story

I

Rājapura was a beautiful and prosperous city in the kingdom of Yaudheya. The ruler was King Māridatta who took care to keep his tutelary goddess, Caṇḍamāri, appeased by arranging periodical offerings of animal sacrifices. On one such day of worship, the King himself repaired to the temple and, seeing various couples of animals brought by people, commissioned his officer, Caṇḍakarman, to fetch him a human couple for the purpose of sacrifice. He said—‘ After I have first sacrificed the human pair with my own hands, the citizens shall sacrifice the pairs of lower animals. Otherwise, the breach in traditional procedure might bring down the fury of the goddess upon us ! ’

Meanwhile, the ascetic Sudatta arrived in the outskirts of Rājapura with a retinue of five hundred monks. In this company there were two novices, Abhayaruci and Abhayamati, who were brother and sister. Since they were yet young and unable to observe rigorous fasts, etc., Sudatta permitted them to beg food for themselves in the city.

On their way, the two were caught by Caṇḍakarman who took them to the King in the temple. They were not perturbed in the least even at the sight of the gruesome spectacle there and the certain prospect of their death. When asked to bless the King, they wished that wisdom, which consists in doing good to living beings, might dawn upon him soon

The King was amazed by their composure, and begged them to tell him how they could be so fearless in the face of death even at such a tender age.

Abhayaruci, the brother, said in reply : ' I am glad that your mind is at last weering round to the notion of dharma. Our autobiography is sure to prove an incentive to good life and a warning against the sin of violence. Pray, listen ! '

II

Ujjayinī, the famous city in Avanti, was being ruled by a glorious king, Yaśogha, whose charming queen was Candramatī. To them was born a son, significantly called Yaśodhara. The prowess of the prince was mighty and his dignity matchless. He vanquished many a foe in battle and took for his queen the lovely lady Amṛtamatī who gave birth to a prince Yaśomati.

Meanwhile, the old King renounced the world after transferring the kingdom to Yaśodhara. The chance discovery of grey hairs on his head had made him world-weary, and he betook himself to the forest to practice austerities.

Now the cup of Yaśodhara's happiness was full. The Queen loved him, the people worshipped him, and he had no enemies to disturb his peace. He regaled himself in the company of his sweet wife.

One night, after enjoying love's delights with the queen, the King fell asleep with his arms around her. The king's elephant-keeper in the stable outside suddenly broke forth into song, sweet and enchanting.

" The queen, lying on her couch with half-closed eyes, her body languid with amorous sports,

All night long his mind was agitated by the shocking conduct of Amṛtamati, whom he had taken for a paragon of virtue so long. He became disgusted of worldly pleasure once and for all and decided to seek perfection which knows not inconstancy.

The next morning, he started a game and struck Amṛtamati with a soft flower in jest. But she dropped down to the ground, senseless as it were; and then the King cleverly made her know how much he knew about her. It was only a hint with a punning reference to the cripple's lashes the previous night; but it had set the Queen thinking.

Yaśodhara then went to his mother, Candramati, to pay his respects as usual. She could at once see that the son had lost his usual cheer.

III

The fond mother made loving enquiries about the son's consternation. Apparently, she could see no cause to upset him. Yaśodhara satisfied her curiosity by inventing the story of a bad dream he had dreamt. Lovely Moonlight had united with fell darkness, in his dream. The simple mother, however, took the King's words literally and became anxious for his safety. She suggested superstitiously that offering sacrifices to Caṇḍikā was the only remedy to avert the evil foreboded by the dream.

Not all the King's appeals to her reason were of any avail. His reminding her of the first religious principle of non-violence was in vain. The king was in a quandary; and as a concession to her sentiments, he agreed to sacrifice to the goddess a feint cock made of dough, on the day of the Festival of the Mother Goddess.

This was accordingly done ; and what a miracle when the beheaded bird of flour shrieked like a living one !

The King's sorrow was complete. If the Queen had deceived him, the Queen Mother had pushed him into deadliest sin. Sorrow for him in birth after birth was now a certainty. So he at once gave the kingdom to his son Yaśomati, and made ready to go to the forest. At this juncture, the Queen Amṛtamātī invited him and Candramatī for a banquet ; and they accepted the invitation for sake of courtesy. Both of them were poisoned to death by that unscrupulous woman.

The chain of their rebirths, full of suffering, at once started :—

1. Yaśodhara—peacock ; Candramatī—dog.

The two, born in the forest, find their way to the palace in Ujjayinī. The peacock's antenatal memory is revived the moment it sees Amṛtamātī still dallying with the cripple, and torments her, only to be killed by the dog, which in its turn is killed by the dice-board thrown at it by King Yaśomati.

2. Yaśodhara—boar ; Candramatī—cobra.

The boar kills the cobra ; and a tiger kills the boar in the forest.

3. Yaśodhara — red-eyed fish ; Candramatī — crocodile.

The crocodile snatches a female attendant of the King and is got out by fishermen who torture it to death. The fish too is caught and is served as food for Brahmins at Yaśodhara's own annual ceremony !

4. Yaśodhara—he-goat ; Candramatī—she-goat.

The son-goat mates with the mother-goat. Once King Yaśomati hunts down the mother.

5. Yaśodhara—goat, posthumously born; Candramatī—buffalo.

The embryo of the dead goat is brought up by an untouchable. It grows and serves the purpose of 'purifying' the stale meat of buffaloes, as declared by Brahmins and the purified meat is served at Yaśodhara's śrāddha! The he-goat indulges in musings about the futility of the whole show.

The buffalo, sporting in the river Śiprā, kills the royal horse and is caught and tortured to death by the King's men. It was roasted alive. Amṛtamatī ate its meat with zest. She also wanted the goat's flesh. Though she was a leper now with stinking sores, her zest for meat was as strong as ever. Her crimes had become the talk of servants in the palace.

6. Yaśodhara—cock; Candramatī—cock.

Both were born in an untouchable's house and brought up by Caṇḍakarman.

IV

It was a gay spring. All nature was clothed in beauty. King Yaśomati, in the company of his Queen Kusumāvalī and other lovely ladies, went out on an excursion to the park outside the city.

Commissioned as he was to keep the park clean, Caṇḍakarman went there on duty and saw sage Akampana, at the foot of a tree. He listened to religious discourses from him, which silenced all his doubts. The sage expounded to him the nature of soul, its sorrows and perfection; the means to salvation and the nature of good and evil. The sage also pointed to the two cocks with him and gave an account of their sufferings in birth after birth, all because of violence in intent. On hearing this, the cocks recollected their past births, became religious, and crew aloud.

At the same time, King Yaśomati shot them down with a sound-guided missile.

Their departing souls entered the womb of Queen Kusumāvalī close by, and finally, they were born as twins—Abhayaruci and Abhayamatī.

Once, the King who had gone out hunting saw an ascetic on his way. Since he did not get game, he was angry and set his hounds against the ascetic while returning. But the dogs could do nothing. He was so angry that he wanted to kill the monk himself.

At the nick of time, there arrived a noble merchant, Kalyāṇamitra, who counselled reason and spoke of the greatness of the ascetic, Sudatta, who was himself once a King of Kalinga, before he became a monk.

King Yaśomati regretted his rashness, and fell at the feet of his holiness. The saint read the murderous mind which the King had first entertained and this surprised him all the more. He then wished to know the state of his grandfather, father, mother etc., and was told how Yaśogha was in heaven, while Amṛtamatī was damned in hell and how Yaśodhara and Candramatī had to undergo various rebirths till they finally became his own twin issues.

Hearing this tale of Yaśodhara's horrid wanderings, the King became wise and gave up violence. His twin issues arrived there by that time and they at once recollected their past lives.

Yaśomati and, a little later, Abhayaruci along with his sister Abhayamatī renounced the world, leaving the kingdom in the hands of Yaśodhara II (the brother of Abhayaruci).

The twins became apprentices of saint Sudatta. " O Māridatta, we ourselves are king Yaśomati's twin children. How strange that our attempt at killing a bird should result in such horrid wanderings in various lives! But when we see you about to kill a whole host of living animals, we are filled with wonder and pity ! "

On hearing this story, the grim goddess, Mārī, herself renounced her love of violence. King Māridatta too sought spiritual instruction from sage Sudatta. Giving up his evil ways, he practiced love, and attained heaven. The twins too found happiness at last in heaven.

(ii) Vādirāja's Sources

The story of Yaśodhara became eventually so popular with Jaina poets that we have more than a score of its later versions in Sanskrit, Prakrit, Apabhraṃśa and modern Indian languages. By the time of Vādirāja, however, so many versions were not there ; and it is a pity that he has not alluded to his sources at all.

As Prof. Handiqui has elaborately shown in his masterly work on Yaśastilaka⁸⁵, the earliest Yaśodhara-carita that we know of is by Prabhañjana before the 8th century A. D. It was probably in Prakrit. But the work is no longer extant, and we do not know whether Vādirāja had access to it.

Next comes the version in Haribhadra's Prakrit Samarāiccakahā. The tale of Yaśodhara as found in this work has been well summarised both by Jacobi⁸⁶ and 85. Yaśastilaka and Indian Culture, p. 42.

86. Samarāiccakahā Vol. I. (Calcutta, 1946), p. LX ff.

Handiqui. So we will note here only the points of difference. There is no reference in Haribhadra to Māridatta and his attempted human sacrifice. All the proper names are different. Yaśodhara's father is Amara-datta (not Yaśogha), mother Yaśodharā (not Candramatī) and Queen Nayanāvalī (not Amṛtamatī). The story opens with the scene of adultery straightaway, and adds that the King had a real dream also the next night. The dream was that he was sitting on the top of the palace on a throne from which his mother pushed him down; he rolled down to the seventh floor dragging down his mother behind him. He tells his mother, however, a modified version of the dream that he had become a monk and tumbled from the top of the palace. Then follows the episode of the artificial cock's sacrifice. The Queen not only poisons the husband and mother-in-law but throttles the husband to make doubly sure of his death. The seven rebirths next recounted are exactly alike except for the change in the name of Yaśomati into Guṇadhara, and of monk Akampana into Śaśiprabha.

But the conclusion is indeed wholly different. Abhayaruci's narrative, instead of stopping with his ascent to heaven, continues; and we are told how he was reborn on earth as Yaśodhara once again and how he had an early insight into Truth with the memory of his former lives and how he renounced the world along with his betrothed, Vinayamatī.

It will be seen that Vādirāja does not follow either the conclusion of Haribhadra or the details of the dream as mentioned by him, or the proper names of the characters. Nor is the promiscuous love of the Queen properly motivated in Haribhadra's handling. But Vādirāja has described the ravishing melody of the cripple's song which won her heart. And the lady does not wring the neck of her husband in Vādirāja's version. Thus it seems that Vādirāja must have had some other version of the story before him when he wrote the Yaśodharacarita.

We know for certain that the encyclopaediac work *Yaśāstilakacampū*⁸⁷ of Somadeva and *Jasaharacarit*⁸⁸ of Puṣpadanta were written about fifty years before the work of Vādirāja. Since these authors resided in Karnatak, we might concede that Vādirāja might have looked into these two works. Yet, it is difficult to point to clear cases of his borrowing from any of these writers, beyond the indebtedness to proper names. In both these works Māridatta is associated with a Śaiva teacher Bhairavānanda (or Vīrabhairava according to Puṣpadanta) who eggs him on to animal slaughter including human sacrifice. Vādirāja has shown his tolerance in dropping out this association. On the whole, Puṣpadanta's work seems to be the model for Vādirāja—except for minor details like the dream and the Queen's strangling—in respect of narrative, rather than Somadeva's work which bristles with a thousand and one digressions. Stray motifs like that of the song might have been suggested by Somadeva's text. But the artistic unity brought into the diffuse elements of the story should go to the singular credit of Vādirāja. While shunning the biting satire, the boundless philosophical controversies and the artificial digressions of Somadeva, Vādirāja manages to infuse the maximum of human and poetic interest into his work without sacrificing the cause of moral instruction. The arrangement of the plot shows the hand of a master. His descriptions of the grim temple, the bloody king, the calm neophytes, the delights of love, the ravishing song, the unfaithful woman, the horrid cripple, the King's reaction, etc. are intensely moving and dramatic, and never out of proportion. Not a word is in excess though the figures of speech come at the poet's bidding. The poet's happy imagery and the gift of phrasing hold us captive even at the first reading. In the second part which is full of birth-stories, the poet is careful to hurry over, and provides relief to the reader in the discourses on religion which are indeed short and memorable. When we read Vādirāja's Yaśodharacarita we at once feel that we are in the presence of a master-poet (Mahākavi); and it is this poetic facility of his which raises the work above the level of mediocrity, and makes it something more than a mere religious story. And in this, Vādirāja is really original. Though the work contains only about 300 verses in but four cantos, the critic will not hesitate to concede it the status of a 'mahākāvya' (Literary epic), claimed in its colophon. In sheer poetic quality it is second to none in Sanskrit literature; and as the shortest and sweetest mahākāvya, it is entitled to a singular place in the history of Sanskrit poetry. It is short in compass, modern in theme, and moralistic in tone—a rare combination indeed. Its story is based on a popular, interesting, folk-tale, not on the trite subjects provided in Purāṇas and classical epics.

To the present editor it appears that in the matter of the religious sermon of Akampana to Caṇḍakarma, Vādirāja is indebted to Hariṣeṇa's version of this story known as Yaśodhara-Candramatī-Kathānaka in the Brhatkathākośa,⁸⁹ because there are quite a number of striking similarities in thought and expression. This point has not been noticed by earlier scholars. The whole discourse is in terms of homely analogies, and four or five analogies in question-and-answer form in the same order cannot be assumed to occur independently to two writers. As Hariṣeṇa's date is 932 A. D., i. e., about a century earlier than Vādirāja's, there is nothing to militate against borrowing on the latter's part. Some of the parallelisms are set out below :—

These correspondences in thought are too close to admit of any other explanation save borrowing. But anyone can see how the crude nugget of Hariṣeṇa acquires polish and poetic finish in the hands of Vādirāja. And the parallelisms do not extend to other portions.

One point remains to be disposed of in this section. T. S. Kuppaswami Sastri stated in his Sanskrit Introduction to the Tanjore edition of the Yaśodharacarita that the source of this story was undoubtedly the Uttarapurāṇa of Guṇabhadra. He also added that the story occurs under the Book on Suvrata Tīrthaṅkara.⁹⁰ This opinion is quietly adopted by Winternitz and De in their reputed works on Sanskrit Literature;⁹¹ and other scholars like K. V. Raghavachar⁹² have followed suit.

The present editor has tried in vain to locate the reference in the published Uttarapurāṇa of Guṇabhadra. The story is conspicuous by its absence not only in the life-history of Suvrata but in the Uttarapurāṇa as a whole. Here is an example of a factual error handed on from writer to writer and it gives a lesson that one has to be very careful in recording one's evidence.⁹³

92. Kannada Yaśodharacarite (Mysore), p. lxx.

93. There is one indirect parallel furnished in one of the stories of the Uttarapurāṇa, viz., of two brothers taking lower births successively because of their mutual anger (krodha-kaṣāya); but this is in no way connected with Yaśodhara's story as we have it here. — cf. Uttarapurāṇa (Ch. 62). Since writing the above, it has come to my notice that S. Bommarasa Pandita has also questioned this ascription in his Kannada Edition of Janna's Yaśodharakāvya (Maraduru, 1951.)

Another conjecture of the same kind hazarded by Kuppuswami Sastri is Vādirāja's authorship of the Tamil Yaśodhara-Kāvyaṃ.⁹⁴ Gopinatha Rao, who alludes to it, states as follows:—

“ They (the Sanskrit and Tamil versions) are both so strikingly alike in composition and diction that there is every probability, as Mr. Kuppuswami Sastri ventures to think, that they were written by one and the same author ”.⁹⁵

Prof. A. Chakravarti, to whose valuable works in English we owe our knowledge of Jaina literature in Tamil, is more cautious in his estimate :—

Unlike Jaina literary works in Sanskrit where the authors generally give a bit of autobiographical information, either at the beginning or at the end of the work, in Tamil literature the author maintains absolute silence on that matter... Practically nothing is known about the author except that he was a Jaina ascetic... There is a Sanskrit Yaśodhara-Kāvya dealing with the same story. But it is not clearly known which is earlier, the Tamil or the Sanskrit one. ”⁹⁶

Another authority on the subject opines:—

“ Yaśodharakāvyaṃ is one of the five minor epics in the period nearer to the third ‘Sangam Age’... Yaśodharakāvyaṃ based on a Sanskrit work, consists of 320 stanzas. ”⁹⁷

Thus, much can be said on both sides regarding the relation of the Tamil 'Yāsodharakāvyaṃ' vis à vis Vādirāja's Sanskrit work. It is difficult to take any definite position. But since the correspondence in the story is far too close, to the extent of similarity in the name of the Queen's servant-maid (viz. Gunavatī) who figures but once in the whole poem, and who is found exclusively in Vādirāja's version, one might not be far from truth to think that the anonymous Tamil poem is modelled on that of the celebrated Sanskrit poem of Vādirāja, and not vice versa, in the present state of our knowledge of Tamil chronology.

We have already seen that Yāsodhara's story was quite popular with writers from about 650 A. D., the probable date of Prabhañjana. How much earlier it might have been current is difficult to determine. A sort of hint is dropped by Vādirāja, if we can look upon his epithet 'Kulena Gaṅgaḥ'⁹⁸ (IV 46) with reference to saint Sudatta, king of Kalinga, being based on historical tradition. History knows that Kings of the Gaṅga family began to rule the Kingdom of Kalinga only by about the 5th Century A. D., when the Gaṅga

98. This epithet is echoed by the Kannada poet Janna in his Yāsodharacarite (IV. 43) in the form 'Gaṅgāśloka cakravartī'.

99. Cf. "Towards the close of the 5th century A. D. the Gaṅgas for the first time appear as rulers of the kingdom of Trikalīnga..."—Harekrishna Mohanty, 'The History of Orissa' p. 43.

But it is claimed by mythical chronicles that the ancestors of the Gaṅga dynasty in the 1st century A. D. were descended from the ancient Harāyudha. See Prasad, Puruṣārtha-siddhiyaṇḍya (Varanasi, 1910) Introduction, p. 28.

was founded by them. The story of Sudatta might thus date back to the historical period.

Similar stories of faithless women are not unknown to Sanskrit and Prakrit literature. For example, the moral of a Jātaka story¹⁰⁰ is—

... “All women fail to find delight in homes that are their own.

Thus does a wife forsake her lord though lusty be and strong

And will with any other man, e'en a cripple vile, go wrong.”

a moral which can well fit in with Yasodhara's story.
Another story concludes—

“A sex composed of wickedness and guile,
Unknowable, uncertain as the path
Of fishes in the water—womankind
Hold truth for falsehood, falsehood for the truth !
As greedily as cows seek pastures new,
Women, unsated, yearn for mate on mate,
As sand unstable, cruel as the snake,
Women know all things ; naught from them is hid.”¹⁰¹

E. B. Cowell observes that “Like all collections of early popular tales, they (Jātaka stories) are full of violence and craft, and betray a low opinion of woman.”¹⁰² The world of the *Brhat-kathā*¹⁰³ (as repre-

Swift's Gulliver's Travels. And this vein of subtle satirical humour is Vādirāja's own. The central thread that binds together the two parts, viz., life at the human level and life at the level of animals, is furnished by the interplay of love and hate. This panorama of light and shade goes on unchecked until wisdom dawns; and wisdom is but another name for the practice of ahimsā in thought, word, and deed. The whole human and animal situation dramatically unrolls before us, transfigured by the imagination of the poet, and the artistic unity of the poem finally synchronises with the ethical law of ahimsā-dharma itself. This impression of unity we miss in Somadeva's voluminous work; and Puṣpadanta's art pales in comparison with that of Vādirāja. Hariṣaṇa's account is deficient in the human touch, since all his attention is on the narration of the incidents in summary fashion and not on delineation of character. Thus Vādirāja's Yaśodharacarita shines in comparison with previous versions of the story.

(iii) Characters

Sanskrit poetic tradition recognised only perfect types of heroes and heroines for treatment in serious epics and dramas. Poets and playwrights, therefore, turned to heroic sagas of the past for their material and sang of gods and god-like heroes. The canon of decorum (aucitya) held complete sway over the critical judgements of Indian literary theorists, and the slightest indelicacy (anaucitya) in the treatment of passions was severely condemned.¹⁰⁵ While literary theory recognised 'Love' (or 'S'ṛṅgāra') as the "rasa" par excellence,¹⁰⁶ it took pains to point out how it would be caricatured into 'the comic' (Hāsyā) with the slightest touch of indelicacy¹⁰⁷, if the rigid rules about characters as laid down in the books were not scrupulously observed. The love-poet's worst failure was thus bathos, and he was not permitted to build a literary work on an immoral theme. Of course, theorists permitted introduction of such elements in rival and low characters (when S'ṛṅgāra would be just S'ṛṅgārābhāsa), but never in the hero or the heroine. The distinction between rasa, rasābhāsa, and grāmya (doṣa) is fundamental to Indian poetic judgement,¹⁰⁸ and classical Sanskrit writers, including masters like Kālidāsa, conformed to these general requirements. We have practically no adventurous writer who dared to set critical standards at naught, and win new territory for creative writing. Literature remained for quite a long time shut up in the narrow groove prescribed by orthodoxy, with the result that it soon began to show signs of decadence in an atmosphere of artificial refinement. The breath of life as actually lived by the Indian people is practically missed in the elaborate accounts of standard heroes treated to a plethora of poetic conceits. If we turn to Vāṇirāja's Yaśodharacarita against this background, we get a refreshing sense of relief. We breathe living air and we hear living voices. We discover a modern note for the first time in the very conception of character. Even Vādirāja's hero and heroine, not to mention the rest of the characters, are figures in flesh and blood who love and hate, sin and suffer, like the common lot of humanity. Though they are royal personages, they represent the life of 'everyman' since they are not just paragons of might and virtue, but partake of the weaknesses and follies of the whole of humanity. Vādirāja is entitled to a high place in the history of Sanskrit Poetry for having succeeded in introducing a note of realism and modernism which was unknown before. Our conventional dramas and epics cannot be 'tragic' in the nature of things, but Vādirāja's Yāśodharacarita is nothing if it is not a tragedy. It is a tragedy, not only of Yāśodhara, but of Everyman. It is a tale of Life, Death and Redemption. It is a story of Paradise lost and Paradise regained.

105. Cf. 'anaucityādrte nānyad rasabhāṅgasya kāraṇam?' Dhvanyāloka, p. 330, (Kāshī edn.).

Yāśodhara, the hero

In our strong reaction to the sin of the heroine, we are likely to give her more importance than she deserves. The poet does not intend her to be a tragic heroine, as he intends Yāśodhara to be a tragic hero. Amṛtamati comes and goes; only one nefarious role is assigned to her. Her affair is no more than an interlude, a passing phase, in the life of the hero which forms the entire poem.

Yāśodhara was blessed with wealth and status, power and pelf, health and youth; in fact, with everything that should make a man happy. His sway over the realm was unquestioned, his people were happy, his marriage with Amṛtamātī sweet and his personality glorious. So he naturally gave himself up into thinking that he was the happiest man on earth. Was there anything wrong in that ? Well, thereby hangs the tale. Is supreme happiness a possibility in this world ? Religion says no. It is only a fact of heaven, not of this earth. Man is deluded into thinking that he is at the summit of happiness just when he is about to fall headlong into misery. Such was also the Greek idea of the lot of man on earth; and they thought that gods would become jealous if anyone said he was happy, and would at once push him into the abyss of suffering. But the Indian view is more philosophical and it makes man himself responsible for both his downfall and uplift. Absence of wisdom leads to downfall and he will rise again with the dawn of wisdom. Fate does not become a blind force here shaping his destiny from the outside ; but becomes another name for his own wisdom or ignorance become active and productive.

When Yaśodhara did flatter himself to be the happiest man in the society of his lovely queen Amṛtamātī, he was only ignorant and unaware of the evil ways of women. This was his tragic frailty and it brought down upon himself, most unexpectedly though, the worst misery that he could have imagined for himself. His most trusted wife proved a downright adulteress. She stooped down to the lowest depths of degradation conceivable, by surrendering her virtue to a horrid, ugly, cripple, a beastly and brutish menial. The King saw it with his own eyes and could have killed the criminals down with his sword at a stroke. They were there at his feet awaiting their well-deserved punishment.

But the King does not strike. Why? Because he is an Indian king and is stronger in self-composure than in emotional indiscretion. The greatness of an Indian hero is tested not by the bloodiness of his revenge, but by the splendour of his self-mastery. He has in him the gift of divine mercy yet; and he lets off the sinners.

But he cannot let himself alone. He punishes himself for his former illusion about woman's constancy. He drives away his attachment to the lures of the senses. The hero Yaśodhara commands our respect in this noble conduct of his when he was tried so harshly by circumstance. Yaśodhara is now disillusioned about the love of a wife. Better wisdom late, than never. He is full of pity for the fickle woman. There it ends.

But the hero's trial did not end there. In fact it proved only the beginning of even more serious trials. Having lost the foothold of his wife's love, the King tries to clutch at the love of his mother like a drowning man who catches at a straw. And it eventually proves far more dangerous. To save his own face and that of his wife, he concocts a white lie while reporting the cause of his worry to his fond mother. He says he had a bad dream, and the mother suggests a remedy worse than the disease. She wants her son to sacrifice live animals, against his conscience though. The King, in a weak moment, compromises with his conscience and the drama of his tragedy starts. Earlier, the King had not done anything sinful; in fact, had conquered the idea of sinful revenge and come out victorious. But now he had contemplated sin, in concession to the sentiments of his mother, and whatever makeshift he might devise, he cannot surely hoodwink the wheels of Karma that grind unremittingly! The mother pushed him into sin and the King rolled down the abyss along with her. The spiritual tragedy could not be escaped now.

The King knew, from the moment the pasty cock crew, that he was doomed ; and he never pardoned his mother as he had done his sinful queen. In vile birth after birth, he became a passive victim losing active initiative once for all. Such is the effect of sin which destroys the spirit. The mother Candramatī, too, shared the same horrid sufferings all the time. At last, the two were lucky enough to hear wisdom from a saint ; and having purified themselves, eventually attained heaven.

Thus the whole poem, from the beginning to the end, is the tragical history of Yaśodhara who represents everyman. Though steeped in misery and suffering, not only in the human life, but much more in the cycles of animal lives exposed to torture and untold misery, the life of the hero is not unrelieved by hope. It breathes the message of optimism and robust faith to everyone who shuns from sin.

Thus Yaśodhara combines in himself the characteristics of both a tragic hero and a religious hero. His character is unique in holding a mirror to the realistic aspects of ancient Indian life.

Amṛtamātī, the heroine

Amṛtamātī is a type of heroine quite unique in Sanskrit literature. With the didactic Sanskrit poets, the only type of married woman admissible into epics were pativrātās or paragons of chastity like Sītā, Sāvitṛī and Damayantī. The Jaina poet does not wish to dilute this ideal ; but he makes bold to portray truth about life as it is actually lived in this world, a truth which is often far from the ideal. The purpose is not to countenance immorality or to encourage it, but to make it a caution and a warning and to force complacent people into some thought on spiritual questions, without which infinite bliss is impossible. Immoral love in the heroine is portrayed not as an end in itself, in which case the poem would be obscene though penned by a monk, but as a means for inculcating the need and value of detachment and renunciation. Amṛtamatī's adultery is not an example, therefore, of śrngāra or Love, but only of an abhāsa or caricature of it. The poet has never lost his sense of constraint in portraying it and does not fail to bring out its moral repeatedly.

In Western literature, the type of unfaithful woman is not at all uncommon. Right from Helen and Cressida, up to their counterparts in modern Miss Julia (of Strindberg) and heroines of Balzac, they have consistently formed themes for the works of literary masters. But in India Amṛtamatī is perhaps the first of that kind; yet she serves only a subordinate role, and forms but a part in the higher harmony, unlike Western heroines of her ilk.

Is Amṛtamatī a tragic heroine? Does she command the sympathy of the poet? These are questions which may be answered in the negative. The poet sympathises no doubt with the lot of womankind as a whole, whose passion outruns judgement. But he does not, on that account, uphold or justify the action of Amṛtamatī in particular. She is not a perfect woman with but a single foible. She is an imperfect woman with no virtue to recommend her except her beauty. If the poet had the least sympathy for her, he would not have painted her paramour in such hideous and horrid colours. The ugly beast has, however, one redeeming feature—a sweet musical voice. But does it exonerate the unabashed adultery of the Queen who should have known better? Again, the contrast between how she gladly takes the lashes and kicks of her lover, and how she faints at the touch of a flower in the King's hand, shows how she was nothing but a clever actress, a woman knowing all the wiles of her sex.

Furthermore, she never for once regrets or relents. She has never a thought of either the husband whom she loved so long, or the son who is grown up, before she stoops to folly. She never justifies herself except on the ground that her passion is irresistible. She is thus intended as the villain of the piece, and that is why the poet makes her coolly murder her husband and mother-in-law, all for a suspicion that her misdeeds have been discovered. One feels that the ends of poetic justice have been served when she is shown later as a bloated mass of flesh with leprous sores running all over, and eventually condemned to perpetual Hell.

Amṛtamatī is thus a warning to women. Though an ascetic, the poet has succeeded in portraying her personality very interestingly without any subversion of values. She is a standing monument to the moral —

“ Earthy desires and sensual lust
Are passions springing from the dust ;
They fade and die,
But in the life beyond the tomb
They seal the immortal spirit's doom
Eternally. ” ¹⁰⁹

109. Longfellow's translation of a poem by Coplas De Marique.

Perhaps Vādirāja is the first writer who successfully delineated S'ṛṅgārarasābhāsa instead of S'ṛṅgārarasa in his heroine, without sacrificing the importance of ultimate S'āntarasa.

(iv) Vādirāja's style, etc.

We have seen in the earlier sections how Vādirāja shows novelty and originality of approach in the handling of his plot and in the delineation of characters in the Yāśodharacarita. The same is no less true of his style, which is free from excesses of all kinds. He strikes a happy balance between pure didacticism and pure eroticism. He does not hesitate to expose social evil in order that he might propose heavenly remedies. He strikes a significant note of humanism, all but rare in Sanskrit poetry. What might have become dreadfully dull is relieved by his glowing account of life's delights as well as pains. Instead of losing himself in the verbiage of conventional tropes and conceits, he finds time to reflect gravely on the sins of the world and the pathways to salvation. Paradoxical as it might appear, the poem is both secular and religious, both realistic and idealistic, both profane and profound. As we already saw, he has an eye for the comic and the ridiculous; and he does not spare any superstition. Even when they figure under the guise of reputed religions, his satire and humour mark them out and laugh them away. Niraṅkuśāḥ karayaḥ, they say. If the poets' power or genius lies in independence, Vādirāja possesses it in an abundant measure indeed. He had before him only classical epics in Sanskrit — large in effect, in characters, events, and setting — the epic scale itself transcending at every point that of ordinary life. But Vādirāja made a new epic from the common lot of humanity, from its sins and sufferings themselves. Man's quest for the meaning of life and his futile struggle against death is the theme here; and as in Greek tragedy, man's suffering is the result of guilt, which must be expiated. It is suffering which prepares the mind to gain redeeming wisdom; but unlike Greek tragedy, it is suffering in birth after birth, both human and sub-human. The genius of Vādirāja lies not so much in the originality of his theme — since Sanskrit literature was quite familiar with similar themes as in Bhartṛhari¹¹⁰ — but in his exquisite treatment of age-old themes.

The Yaśodharacarita does not suffer from the common failing of Sanskrit poems, viz., longwindedness. Vādirāja shows that he is a master of the intricacies of Sanskrit grammar and lexicography, by giving us, occasionally, rare forms and expressions.¹¹¹ A learned commentator like Lakṣmaṇa, who has more than a dozen lexicons at his command, finds himself baffled more than once. But these are kept within limits and are never allowed to outrun the bounds of normality. In style, Vādirāja seems to have had Kālidāsa for his model; and we do not find any pedantic perpetrations which halt the even flow of his sweet poetry. The samāsas are but short and

110. Cf. the famous quatrain —

“yām cintayāmī manasā mayi sā viraktā sāpyanyamicchati janām sa jano'nya-saktaḥ ; asmatkṛte ca parituṣyati kācidanyā dhiktām ca tam ca madanam ca imām ca mām ca.”

111. Cf. e. g., 'śauvani' IV. 38, 'roha' (IV. 20), 'anajathyā' (III. 53), 'pūta-kratāyyā' (II. 13), which are rare words from kośas; and also peculiar grammatical forms, like tāvatitha (III. 2), vipākima (III. 74), adyakvīnam (III. 15).

of rare occurrence, pointing to the Vaidarbhī style so popular in the South. In continuation of what is said in section V.ii. above, it might be added that even in the choice of metres, Vādirāja restricts himself to three or four widely prevalent ones like upajyau, anuṣṭubh and vaiśaṣṭha, and avoids the unfamiliar and longer ones. In his anuṣṭubh-s, we see him a master of the inner rhythm of the verse unlike many an earlier Jaina poet. However, he has a few mannerisms like the word uccakāṭh without any special significance.

His imagery, again, is vivid and striking. He uses only the easy and most effective alaṅkāra-s like upamā (I.8,9 etc.), utprekṣā (I.10,40 etc.), rūpaka (I.57, etc.), arthānturanyāsa (II.38 etc.), etc., showing off his power over śleṣa (double entendre) but rarely, as in the description of the hero's eroticism in Canto II. In depth of vision, felicity of expression and beauty of imagery, Vādirāja stands easily and incomparably first among the Jaina Sanskrit poets. His is a rare combination of artistry and simplicity, grace and force, elegance and moralism. Though, like the natural epic, his Yāśodharacarita centres mainly round orally transmitted folk-lore and legend,¹ it also indicates throughout that it is the creation of the genius of one man, which is the hall-mark of the later literary epic. At the same time, it is free from many of the extravagances in which artificial court poets were specialising. It may, therefore, be said that Vādirāja tried to retrieve the Sanskrit language from the false and pedantic diction of the court poets who were specialising only in panegyrics, and introduced new subjects and new attitudes to life.

The forms of proper names adopted by Vādirāja in this poem, e. g. Yāśogha and Aṣṭa-vaiṅka, perhaps indicate that his main source of the story was in Prakrit. These words appear like irregular Sanskritisations of regular Prakrit words, viz., 'Yaśoha'¹¹² and 'vañka'. It is interesting in this connection to note how Vādirāja makes an effort (in II.3) — which is not very convincing — to justify the former word on the analogy of words like prṣodara noted by the grammarians as irregular.¹¹³

8. Lakṣmaṇa's Sanskrit Commentary on the Yaśodharacarita (i) Manuscripts used

The Commentary of Lakṣmaṇa (also spelt as Lakṣaṇa in two Mss.), published now for the first time, is based on four palm-leaf Mss., all deposited in the Jaina Dānaśālā Maṭha, Mudabidre, (S. Kanara). All of them are in Kannada characters, and the oldest of them, No. 199, seems to be the original of which the other three are later copies. They have all been fully collated for purposes of this edition, and variants have not been noted because they were inconsiderable, and mostly in the nature of scribal errors. The Mss. are described below :—

(ii) Personal details about Lakṣmaṇa, the Commentator

The commentator gives a few autobiographical details in the opening and concluding sections of interesting commentary. They are summarised below.

Lakṣmaṇa or Lakṣṇa (as some Mss. spell name) was the son of Cikkṇa and this commentary was written by the son at the instance of the devo father. Lakṣmaṇa also refers to himself as 'Jinadāsa'. Whether this was a surname of his or only an epithet indicative of his Jaina persuasion, is not clear.¹¹⁴

There were two merchant princes, Padmaṇa and Gummaṭa, at Kṣemapura whose patronage was responsible for the composition of this commentary. The work was actually written out religiously in the temple of Neminātha at Kṣemapura,¹¹⁵ at the instance of the author's father.

Krishnamachariar records in his History of Classical Sanskrit Literature that this Lakṣmaṇa, the Commentator of Vādirāja, is the same as Lakṣmaṇa, the Commentator of Kavirāja's Rāghava-Pāṇḍavīya; and assigns him to the 12th century A. D.¹¹⁶ The latter commentary of Lakṣmaṇa published from Bombay¹¹⁷ contains the colophon :—

114. Cf. akārayadimān tīkāṁ cikkaṇo guṇarakṣaṇaḥ | akarojjinadāso'yaṁ cikkaṇātmaja-lakṣmaṇaḥ || occurring both in the beginning and at the end of the commentary.

115. cf. śrīmatpadmaṇa-gummaṭetyabhihitau
śrīvarṇināu bhūtale khyātau cāru-caritra-vārdhi-himagū
tatprīṭaye lakṣmaṇaḥ |

 — Concluding verse of the commentary.

116. Loc. cit. p. 182.

117. by Gopal Narayan & Co., in the Grantha-ratna-mālā Series.

iti śrīmatpada-vākya-pramāṇa-pārāvāra-pārīṇa,

This clearly shows that Lakṣmaṇa, the commentator of Kavirāja was a Brahmin, a son of Śrīdatta and a disciple of one Uttama-śloka-tīrtha, while Lakṣmaṇa, the commentator of Vādirāja was a Jaina, a son of Cikkēṇa. The two are, therefore, different persons and cannot be held as identical.

(iii) The Place and Date of Lakṣmaṇa.

We are lucky in so far as Lakṣmaṇa has mentioned in so many words that Kṣemapura was his hometown. To those who are familiar with the history of Tuluva and Kanara tracts in South India, the reference is clear enough, and does not present any difficulty. As evidenced by a number of inscriptions and even literary references, Kṣemapura is the same as modern Gerasoppe in North Kanara District. We give below some extracts from Dr. B. A. Saletore's Medieval Junism, which authoritatively settles the question of Kṣemapura's geography and history :—

“Gerasoppe springs into fame in the middle of the fourteenth century due to the activity of its wealthy citizens, although as a political unit it had already made a name for itself earlier. In those ages it belonged to Tuluva, its rulers themselves being of Tuluva origin...”¹¹⁵ Thus is it described in the Govardhanagiri inscription (A. D. 1560) —

‘On the Southern bank of the great lotus, the Jambūdvīpa, is the Bhārata country, in which, on the eastern shore of the Western Ocean is the great Taulava country. In it, on the south bank of the Ambu river, shining like the Śrīpundra (or central sectarian mark on the forehead of the Śrīvaiṣṇavas) is Kṣemapura, like Purandara’s (Indra’s) city with fine Jaina Caityālayas, king’s palaces, abodes of yogis, lines of merchants’ houses, with crowds of people devoted to acts of merit and liberality, groups of gurus and yatis, bands of poets, learned men, multitudes of excellent bhavyas — what city in the world was so celebrated as Gerasoppe ? ’ ” ¹¹⁹

“ ... Yojanaśreṣṭhi (II) built a two-storeyed Caityālaya of Nemīśvara and Gummaṭanātha in Gerasoppe ... Ambāvana Śreṣṭhi, (a commercial magnate of Saluva Immaḍi Deva Raya C. 1523 A. D.) was matrimonially connected with Yojana Śreṣṭhi (II) ... Neminātha basadi was first built by the grandfather of Ambāvana ... ” ¹²⁰

“...In 1939, Cikkaṇa, the son of Dodda Devappa, gave a dharmasādhana (charity deed) to Cāvudī Setti of Grasoppe.” ¹²¹

The above extracts show conclusively that though the present Gerasoppe is no more than a tiny deserted village, it was in a flourishing state from the 14th to 16th centuries A. D. under kings who were patrons of Jainism. It is a fact of history that Jainism which could not stand the sweeping avalanche of Vīraśaivism in Karnataka was driven to seek refuge in out-of-the-way nooks and corners like the Tulu and Nagira Kingdoms. The petty chiefs of Hāḍuvalli (Saṅgītapura), Kṣemapura, etc., gave quarter to Jainism, and it is due to their patronage that Jainism has still a great following in Kanara.

That Kṣemapura or Gerasoppe was a flourishing centre of Jaina culture is also revealed by the following account furnished in the colophon of Amoghavṛtti copied therein¹²² (during the 16th century, if king Devendra is taken as identical with Immaḍi Devarāya) :—

jambūlvīpa-mahīśa-hema-mukūṭa-

122. Ms. of Śaṅkarāyana's Amoghavṛtti (No. 177). of Humbucha Matba Library, noticed by Pandit K. Bhujabali Sastri in Jaina Siddhānta Bhāṣkarā, Vol. XIV, No. 2 (Jan. 1943). p. 23.

In the extracts taken from Dr. Saletore's work earlier, we have references also to the date of construction of Neminātha Basadi which will definitely give us the upper limit of the date of Lakṣmaṇa who wrote his work therein. But unfortunately, there seems to be some discrepancy since Yojana Śreṣṭhi II 'who built the two storeyed caityālaya of Nemīśvara' and who 'was matrimonially connected with Ambāvana' (C. 1523) cannot be the same as 'the grandfather of Ambāvana' 'who first built the Nemīśvara Basadi.' If this means that Ambāvana's grandfather first built it in about 1400 A. D. and Yojana-śreṣṭhi built a second storey to it by about 1500 A. D., then the discrepancy is removed, no doubt. But the relevant epigraph¹²³ only records "the setting up of an image of the Jaina god Neminātha by Ajana whose mother was Mābāmbā and father was Kallapaśreṣṭhi, son of Ojanaśreṣṭhi," and does not bear any date. 'Ajana,' 'Ojana,' and 'Yojana' — only appear to be scribal variations of the same name. Anyway, these facts indicate that Lakṣmaṇa, the commentator of Vādirāja, cannot be earlier than 1400 A. D. if the first Yojana Śreṣṭhi built the Neminātha-basadi, and not earlier than 1500 A. D., if the second Yojanaśreṣṭhi built it for the first time.

The last extract above from Dr. Saletore's book refers also to one Cikkaṇa, son of Dōddadevappa. If this Cikkaṇa is the same as the father of our commentator Lakṣmaṇa, then the latter's date will be decidedly 16th century A. D. But there might have been

123. Mysore Archaeological Report, 1925. p. 119; Inscription No. 107.

several Cikkanaś earlier, and one cannot take similarity in names as conclusive evidence. The age of our oldest Ms. shows that Lakṣmaṇa may not be later than 1550 A. D. at any rate.

(iv) A critical estimate of the commentary.

Coming to the internal evidence furnished by the commentary itself, by way of references to earlier works, we find that Lakṣmaṇa is a very widely read scholar quoting profusely from grammars, lexicons, kāvyas, smṛtis etc., but none of these references are to works later than 1400 A. D. and hence these do not furnish much help in settling the commentator's date.

The grammars quoted throughout are Kātantra (I. 1, 15, 26, 59, etc.) and S'ākaṭāyana (I. 8. etc.) and rarely Pāṇini.

Poets and works referred to are — Vīranandi's Candraprabhākāvyā (II. 45 etc.), Kālidāsa (II. 46, etc.) Vāḍibhaṣaṁha's Kṣatra-cūḍāmāṇi (I. 27), Śrīharṣa's Naiṣaṇḍha (I. 62, etc.), Somadeva (II. 20), Māgha (II. 35), Rāghavān'ka (II. 68), Sarasvatikanṭhābharaṇa (IV. 7), Rāghavapāṇḍavīya (IV. 29), Daṇḍin (II. 7), Kavi Rākṣasa (IV. 45), Haricandra's Dharma-śarmābhyaṇḍaya (IV. 74), Cāṇakya (III. 19), Mahābhārata (IV. 45), and Vasiṣṭha (II. 58), besides several quotations anonymous.

Lexical citations are given, besides Amarakośa, from Viśvaprakāśa (I. 15, etc.) — many untraceable in the published work of Maheśvara though — Vaijayanti (I. 19, etc.), Halāyudha (II. 9, etc.), Rabhasa

(II. 10), Dhanañjaya (II. 13, etc.), Bhāguri (II. 31, etc.), Nāgavarma (III. 13), Dhvanimañjarī (III. 15), Trikāṇḍaśeṣa (IV. 19) and Vyāḍi (III. 30, etc.) whose text has not been recovered so far.

Lakṣmaṇa's commentary is of particular interest to students of Kannada literature in so far as it sheds unexpected light on many dark spots in literary history :

1. It gives us for the first time a citation from Mahākavi Rāghavāṅka's Sanskrit poem, no longer extant (II. 68). Rāghavāṅka happens to be a celebrated poet in Kannada literature with more than one classic like the Harīścandrakāvya to his credit.

2. It gives us for the first time a reference (III. 13) to Nāgavarma's lexicon in Sanskrit. Nāgavarma, is known as an author of Kannada lexicons only like Abhidhānaratnamālā and Vastukośa to Kannada literary history.

3. It gives Kannada equivalents of Sanskrit words more than once, e. g. Sanskrit śūka = Kannada 'kaṇaja' (IV. 17), roha = Kannada 'haguve' (III. 20).

4. It gives us for the first time a clear idea (III. 6a) of Vastuka and Varṇaka — two literary forms famous so far only in Kannada poetry.

the anvaya and thus helps us in construing the verse properly. His rich quotations reveal his wide reading and sound scholarship. His preference for Kātantra and Śākaṭāyana grammars over that of Pāṇini, however, presents us some difficulty since most of us today are conversant only with Pāṇini's terminology. To understand the theological implications of certain words (e. g., 'trigāra', (I. 30), Lakṣmana's commentary may be said to be indispensable. He has also an eye for poetic beauty and explains the figures of speech in the text; and his assistance is indeed great when puns are involved. To sum up, Lakṣmaṇa may be said to represent the best Jaina tradition in the study of Sanskrit classics.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

10. Which, with its banners fluttering in the wind on the mansions of the wealthy, seems to invite, from above, the needy from every direction ;

11. Wherein, fawn-eyed women, though with limbs of unequal (also, 'unequalled') charm, appear to the gallants sweet in every limb ;

12. Where young princes are liberated from the distress of the fire of passion by caressing against their bosom the breasts of women, like mountains caressing clouds ;

13. Wherein riches, like the learning of the virtuous, grow more and more, even when freely distributed to the needy, day after day.

14. In the unmentionable (a euphemism for 'southern') quarter of that city, stands the goddess Candamānī to whom animal slaughter is exceedingly dear .

20. The cuckoos on the branches of the mango trees in the temple-yard looked like offerings of meat, at the ends of spears, brought by Spring (the devotee).

21. Unable to let any delay in the punctual worship of the deity, (the punctilious) King Māridatta repaired to the temple of that goddess.

22. At his command, the citizens brought at once, from all quarters, pairs (i. e. a male and a female) of various animals.

23. In the temple of the goddess, cocks, goats, stags, boars, buffaloes, etc., bound down by tight ropes, were crying aloud in pain.

24. The earth, rent in several places by their piercing yells, seemed to indicate so many openings of the gateways to Hell.

25. The King pulled out his sword and gave this command to Caṇḍakarman :—" Seek out a human pair endowed with wholesome features.

26. After I have sacrificed the human pair with my own hands to the goddess, the citizens shall sacrifice the different pairs of lower animals.

27. Otherwise, there will be a breach of rule, unleashing the fury of the goddess, to the utter destruction of infants and women, cattle and elders."

28. Thus bidden by the King, Caṇḍakarman sent his men at once in all directions and set out himself in quest of a human pair.

29. Meanwhile, the wise and eminent sage Sudatta arrived in the garden of that city with a retinue of five hundred ascetics.

30. He was free from the three Defects (viz., passion, hatred, and ignorance) and devoid of the Three Injuries (viz., mental, vocal and physical); his conquest over the Three Darts (viz., falsity, illusion, and evil) was complete and he was not tainted by the Three Prides (viz., of wealth, enjoyment and peace.)

31. He was free from the seven fears (viz., of this world, the next world, ability, unprotection, death, pain and accident), and assuring refuge to all beings. He was ever earnest in the study of scriptures and he was a shining flame of pure wisdom.

32. He was a singular abode of austerities, and a vast ocean of all holy rites. He was the shining sun for the lotuses of devotees, and he was taintless in his character and conduct.

33. Seated in a holy place there in the company of ascetics, he performed in earnest the prescribed rites after a journey.

34. As the company of ascetics observed a fast that day, the sage commissioned a pair of neophytes to obtain alms for themselves.

35. Bowing down to the sage, the twins set out and were caught on their way by Caṇḍakarman who took them later to the King of Rājapura.

36. Abhayaruci (the boy) addressed these words to his sister (Abhayamatī) :—" Sister, be reconciled in your mind. Do not fear death !

37. Don't you know that pain has lost its edge towards us through our prolonged ascetic life ? When the body itself is the source of all pains, how can one expect relief from pain so long as the body endures ?

38. Therefore, why should one wail in suffering that which cannot be avoided ? The wise ones declare that conquest of suffering is the highest penance. "

39. Hearing the words of her elder brother, Abhayamatī declared : " What fear can we have when we know the truth about the past and the future alike ? "

40. This is spiritual wisdom, and this its finest fruit : namely, disinterestedness in joy and suffering alike."

41. Consoling each other in this way, the princely pair arrived unvexed at the temple of the terrible Mārī.

42. Wherein the floor, bathed in blood and red in hue, was like the out-stretched tongue of the goddess desiring to taste the wine of blood.

43. Where the heaps of flesh, infested by swarming flies, looked like the undigested excess of food vomited out by the terrible Mārī.

44. Through the fresh human skulls hung on the high projections of the temple-wall, the goddess appeared, as if she were assuming numerous faces and looking for live sacrifices.

45. When the king drew near, these wise twins, being urged by the people to bless him, pronounced the following benediction :—

46. " O King, may this kingdom be the best governed one by your adopting the code of morality which is conducive to the good of all living beings and which ensures the good of all subjects."

47. Seeing them speak so fearless and free, Māridatta fell into quiet thought, with eyes staring in dismay :

48. " Is this perchance a divine pair disguised in human form ? Or perhaps a celestial couple fairer than Cupid and his mate ?

49. Never before have my eyes espied such unexcelled beauty. By luck, at last, my eyes have reaped the reward of their existence.

50. Even after seeing me with the drawn sword and this goddess so relentness, the minds of these two remain unvexed. What a matchless courage !”

51. Then he put them these questions aloud : “ Who are you ? ” “ Whence did you come ? ” “ Which is your family ? ” “ For what reason are both of you disinterested in pleasures even in childhood ? ”

52. Thereupon the wise Abhayaruci replied to him in words whose light dispelled the boundless darkness of sin.

53. “ Oh King, our account is such as can be liked by the virtuous only. But you are fond of vice. Of what avail is our tale ? ”

54. A perverse nature cannot brook the sight of virtue. To one affected by bilious fever, milk does not taste sweet.

55. So let our story alone. Do that which thou thinkest good. May that which our karma has conditioned be our lot. We have nothing to complain about.”

56. On hearing this, the King threw his sword away and with folded hands importuned him to narrate his story. The prince then started his narration.

57. Meanwhile, the whole lake of royal retinue honoured that waxing moon (viz., Abhayaruci) exuding the nectar of morality, with lotus-buds of folded hands.

58. “ Oh King, I heartily congratulate you on your mind being drawn towards the Noble Path. Religious faith, once kindled, will surely bring a benevolent mind to men in course of time.

59. Turn your attentive mind, therefore, to my discourse, dripping with the nectar of holy Dharma. Heard with religious faith, it will surely dispel sufferings, one and all.

60. Not only has this been declared by perfected saints (Jinas) who realised the Absolute, but this is our experience also, burnt, as we have been, by a thousand sufferings, time and again.

61. I shall narrate to you, O King, this delightful autobiography of ours, which will serve to dispel all evil. Please do heed the words of the virtuous.

62. The wise ones who will listen attentively to this holy account, quintessential, and conducive to the acquisition of the choicest state of all glory and joy, will surely paint the walls of the directions with their fame, white and radiant as the jasmine and the moon, and attain eternal bliss, after enjoying the highest pleasures in this world.

Canto II

1. There is, in the kingdom of Avantī, the famous city of Ujjayinī, abounding in delightful comforts, and competing with the wealthy capital (Amarāvati) of the heavenly king, Indra, in respect of riches.

2. In that city reigned a wise king, with the glorious name Yaśogha, whose boundless valour was exhibited in his annihilation of proud adversaries in many a battle.

3. Since he decked the walls of directions with the paint of his glory, white as lotus, learned men proficient in etymology of words like prṣodara (prṣat + udara, where t is irregularly dropped), gave him the appropriate name 'Yaśogha' (yaśas + ghas).

4. Even as the paste of red sandal-wood, full of saffron powder and camphor, cooled his hot limbs when smeared over his bosom, so did the moon-faced Candramatī, full of love, abate his love-fever by being pressed to his bosom in privacy.

5. To them was born a glorious son, by name Yaśodhara, matchless in good manners and valour. He was spreading, in all directions, the radiance of his fame, white as the train of waves in the Milky Ocean.

6. Abandoning the autumnal moon for fear of fading again as it were, Moonlight made her permanent home in his face, the abode of unfading beauty, and the seat of blooming blue lotuses, namely, the eyes.

7. The broad chest of that beaming prince, adorned by the necklace of shining pearls, seemed as if it were adorned by the radiant smile of the sporting goddess of wealth, residing therein.

8. His two massive arms, long like snakes, and like two embodiments of martial valour, served as Rāhu and Ketu to the rising orb of the moon, viz., the host of enemy kings.

9. Smashing down, as he did, the elephants' heads, viz., adversaries, he was a lion through and through in valour. Yet, because his body was the permanent abode of beauty, he attained fame on earth, only as the lion-waisted one.

10. In him who had the best of all virtues, there was nothing middling or low. (Passionate) damsels (interested in the latter) could not, therefore, feel satiated with him.

11. What wonder that his feet, rosy like fresh lotuses (and 'two veritable rubies'), gaining in splendour by applications of unguent (and 'by the work of lapidaries'), attained, by their excellence, the state of crest-jewels for the heads of vassal kings?

12. He had a queen, Amṛtamatī by name, whose limbs were fashioned as it were out of the moon's sweetest essence. Using her as the pulse, Love became aware of the throbbing delight in the King's heart.

13. He begot through her a son, Yaśomati, a grandson to Yaśogha, delighting the entire world with the nectar of his glory, just as Indra begot Jayanta through Pūtakratāyī (or Śacī).

14. Yaśogha, transferring the burden of administration to the noble youth, (Yaśodhara,) endowed with all the excellences within himself, became carefree and happy, enjoying the company of royal Lakṣmī for long.

15. Once the King in his court, attended upon by vassals, chanced to sight his grey hairs in the mirror, and religious as he was, renounced his craving for sensual pleasures.

16. At once, he made over his kingdom to Yaśodhara, of mighty prowess, and followed by a hundred kings who were also bent upon renunciation, betook himself to a penance-groove.

17. The goddess of sovereignty was full of attachment to him, the new husband, illustrating, as it were, the common nature of women. In every limb she expanded as though nourished by his constant attentions.

18. Bedewed with moonbeams, viz., his excellences, the entire populace shook off the scorching torment due to the king's parting, and took to him, with delight, he being like the dew-rayed moon in whom the light itself has taken shelter.

19. His conduct never angered the people. Discriminate as he was in action, he never became repulsive to them. With his wealth of modesty, he could never insult anyone. A liberal donor that he was, he could not brook avarice.

20. Only his sparkling physical eye would close during his sleep; but his other eye, constituting the machinery of administration, was ever (open and) wakeful; and with this he put an end to the very stealing tendency in thieves.

21. He repulsed the devilish attack of the rising foe, fierce like Ketu ('the dragon's tail'), and won back his full domain? (also, 'the moon's full orb') victoriously, by dint of his valour (also, 'fire') kindled into flame upon the altar of the battle-sword by the counsel of ministers (also, 'sacred chants') and daring deeds (also, 'observance of ritual').

22. Once, at the close of day, he dismissed the assembly and, going up the mansion with walls of gems, arrived gracefully in the bed-chamber of his beloved, seeking connubial delights.

23. Then the sweet fumes of dark aloes, dark like the wings of pigeons, were seen issuing out of the lovely casements, after perfuming the inner apartments.

24. In the soothing red light of rubies there, the jasmine wreaths looked red indeed; and the people could recognise the blooming jasmines therein only by their fresh fragrance (and not by colour).

25. The wind, perfumed by camphor-dust, and blowing so soft and slow about the windows there, seemed like the sweet breath of the living goddess of that mansion.

26. On the couch with its dark legs of shining emeralds, and with white coverlets made of the soft feathers of white swans, the King, with his body comely with sandalwood paste, diverted himself with the Queen.

27. Now the lover would play the bee to the blooming lotus of her face; now would he wipe away the smear of sandalwood-paste on her plump breasts.

28. Now, embraced in the neck by her arm, adorned with glowing gems, he would become intoxicated with joy like Indra's elephant by the touch of Abhramū (its mate).

29. Now, desiring to secure the treasure in her middle, concealed beneath (the earth, viz.,) her waist-knot, he first dispersed the encircling girdle (viz., serpent) with sweet murmurs (viz., magic spells).

30. . When the passionate husband freed himself from her close embrace and turned his eyes towards her groin, the charming queen became very angry at the diamond lamps which could not be blown out by her.

31. As he laughed aloud, biting her lips with his teeth, she, with a voice full of sweet moans, eyed him in anger and struck him hard with the wreath of jasmine torn from her hair.

32. While she adopted the reverse posture in the love act, perspiration, dripping from her breasts, fell upon his bosom like the oblation of ghee into the fire of passion.

33. At last, when the night had far advanced, the King, fatigued by amorous delights, fell asleep in joy, the grip of his arms around his beloved becoming loose.

34. Meanwhile, having tied down the King's elephant to its post close by the royal bed-chamber, the elephant-keeper who remained awake there, sang forth a song, melodious and sweet.

35. It was clearly rendered through the musical notes. It was excellent by the richness of voice. It was sweet and splendid by his skill in harmony. It was ravishing by the symphony of Mālara-pañcama.

36. The Queen, lying on her couch with half-closed eyes, her body languid after the amorous sports, heard this ravishing song, and at once took a fancy for the gifted singer.

37. The very next morning, the Queen, doting upon him, despatched her lady-in-attendance as a go-between. That lady, by name Guṇavatī, retraced her steps as soon as she saw him and cursed the Queen :

38. " Strange indeed are tho freaks of Cupid at whose bidding one's senses are lost ! Oh, that the Queen, a veritable Urvāṣī in human form, should take a fancy for such a wretch !

39. An odious stench his face emits ; his body is, by birth, bent at the back. Dubious (and bald) are his eyes and brows. No neck at all he has and his hairs on the pate are so few and patchy !

40. His mouth is black like the beak of a crow. As for teeth, many of them are outside the mouth with just a few inside. Charred are his hands by the elephant's urine ; and his belly is bristling with running sores !

41. How, alas, can he fascinate the Queen, a paragon of beauty? Or why should I bother myself about this thought? Desire for the undeserved is in the very nature of women."

42. The messenger, of course, returned to the Queen and reported what she really felt in her mind. But the low-browed Queen, in a voice choking with frenzied passion, said to her:

43. "It is only a mistaken mind which values fresh youth, handsomeness, and nobility of birth. O friend, he that answers to the call of Cupid, is verily a god for pretty women.

44. The conquest of women's heart-treasure is after all the reward of even exquisite handsomeness, should it be present. When that goal is already realised in his case, of what avail is further reasoning? When the effect is accomplished, there is no need, surely, for knowing the cause.

45. Therefore he is verily my angel of love, drawn, as my heart has been, by the stream (lit. 'tube') of his song. O friend, why need I waste words? I cannot live without him."

49. Dismissing the assembly in his court, he entered the bed-chamber set in order, and simulating sleep that night, lay down on the superb couch along with the Queen.

50. Finding him asleep, the Queen extricated her body locked in his arms, picked up betel leaves etc., scents and bouquets, and went out to meet her paramour.

51. Intent on examining her misconduct, the King, with his sword unsheathed, shadowed her from behind on her way, even like Nemesis pursuing a sinner.

52. The paramour who was furious at the Queen for her late arrival, shook her violently by the hair, and thrashed her with the leather strap in his hand.

53. Though kicked down and insulted by that wretch, she did not cry. She was just moving hither and thither like the moonlight under an eclipse in the sky.

54. He placed his foot on her neck until she was swooning and made fun of her aloud :— “ Oh sweet, see how I bear your feet on my head ! Why are you dumb ? Give up your sorrow. ”

55. Recovering her breath somehow, she said :— “ I am not at fault, O darling ! Pray, restrain your anger. Long I had to sit on the throne beside the King ; and that is the cause of my delay.

56. All my senses are ravished by the sweet features of your person. As long as I live, you are my life. How can I ever disregard you ? ”

57. When the King saw her being enjoyed by him after this reassurance, he flew into a rage and waved his sword to cut down the two (culprits). Yet, in his firmness, he reasoned within himself :—

58. “ Of what worth is this mean creature, a groom of my elephants? And a woman, though vile, does not merit the death-penalty. It ill becomes my royal might; on the other hand, it will only tarnish my fame, spotless now as a pearl necklace.

59. How can this sword of mine, meant for slaying heroic enemies on the battle-field, be employed against creatures so base? To be sure, a lion will not employ his tender tooth, which can tear out the temples of elephants, against a mere jackal.

60. So did the King, (majestic as) a royal swan, decide in his mind, and he returned in peace and lay down on his couch sand-white.

61. The very buxomness of her breasts which formerly excited, in his mind given to erotic thoughts, a desire to hug them hard, now brought him disgust.

62. Turning aside her amorous approaches, as if overcome by deep sleep, the King deeply pondered in his own mind, shocked by her adventure :—

63. “ This woman is so lovely in every limb that she can seduce even Cupid. How could she, then, dally with a wretch? Or, perhaps, sensuality breeds unreason.

64. Futile, indeed, is men's boast of handsome physique and blooming youth. Cupid is the master of the hearts of women; and he does what he likes.

65. This woman is surely a rival of Lakṣmī (the fickle goddess of royal splendour) to prove herself such a downright adúlteress. How can I repose implicit confidence in her, so fickle by nature?

66. Fie upon my mind, a prey to passion ! Fie, fie upon riches, heading only towards misery ! Let me, through renouncement, seek for the angel of Perfection who knows not inconstancy. "

67. Occupied with such thoughtful musings, the King lay on his bed with eyes closed ; and got up as though he were awakened as usual by the auspicious morning music falling on his ears.

68. He saw his face reflected in ghee, patted a cow devotedly, and consulted his doctors about physical health. Next, with his trusted retinue, he called on the Queen, seated on a dais, amidst chamber-maids.

69. Starting deliberately a jocular entertainment, the King began to play with her, and struck her soft body with a fresh dark flower, picked in sport.

70 As if unable to bear that pain, when she let her body drop to the ground, the King soothed her by sprinkling perfumed water and spoke out with affected sympathy :

71. " O accomplished (also, ' accursed ') woman, death, which drew so near you when you were hit violently by the dark-faced one exuding moisture (also, ' pus ') from all pores (also ' sores '), has been averted only by extraordinary good luck."

72. With these words suggestive of the nocturnal affair, he admonished the Queen. Very much shaken and seized with anguish, he went then to his mother.

73. Seeing her dear son bowing down his head to her respectfully, Candramatī seemed eagerly to drink him up with her eyes wide open. She inhaled the scent of his uncovered head so close to herself, and, with her buxom breasts oozing out milk, became immensely happy.

74. Sprinkling on the son's head sacred grass and holy rice, fetched by noble housewives from containers made of gems, she blessed him saying: "Long may you rule the entire world, uprooting all your enemies by the sword in your hand!"

75. As the King's face-lotus was fading under the burden of vexation at his wife's misbehaviour, and as he lay breathing out sighs, heavy and hot, Candramatī was foolishly blessing her dearest son with a banner of glory bestowed by the goddess of Victory in battles with bigoted enemies.

Canto III

1. "Endowed with matchless might of arms as you are, my son, no enemies can confront you. Your dominion on this wide earth, begirt by salt oceans, remains unchallenged by any foe.

2. Though appropriated all the time (also, 'along the shore') by clouds, viz., the needy hosts, with rumblings, viz., songs in your praise, the ocean of your treasures remains as full as ever, undiminished.

3. There are numerous youthful damsels, with garlands pushed up by their buxom breasts, with lovely faces lit up by smiles, and with looks sweet and lingering, to delight you in your amorous moods.

5. You live happily amidst the soft and notes of pleasing musical instruments, the enchanting songs of accomplished songstresses, the delightful displays of pretty dancers, and other entertainments.

6. (a) You derive amusement in the assembly of men who can judge (poems, etc.,) with pride, in words dripping with nectar of poetic essence; and who are experts in readily composing narrative and descriptive poems.

6. (b) You derive amusement in the assembly of reciters with elegant and chaste expression; of dialecticians who are like the six-faced god Skanda in the systems of philosophy; and of poets who can readily compose narrative and descriptive poems.

7. How is it, then, that on your face-lotus appear these signs of fading even at day-break? By this sight, my heart is bereft of joy, my son, and is sore as if irritated by salt. "

8. Then the King, equal to the King of gods in prosperity, made answer to his mother: " By your infallible blessings, O mother, I am all right in every way.

9. But last night, O mother, I vividly saw that moonlight got itself separated from the moon, bearing the full glory of the opening night-lotuses (also, 'of the illumined earth below') and made union with darkness.

10. Not even once, in my life, have I ever seen such a thing even in dream. It has got itself fixed in my mind and is causing me unbearable agony.

11. The simple mother took the King's words, suggestive of the wife's misconduct, for a dream verily, and said to him anxiously :

12. "O my son, do take up immediate measures to counteract this. This is indeed a very bad dream you have seen. You should worship the goddess Candikā at once. She, when propitiated, will, surely, ward off troubles.

13. O son, sacrifice at once in her temple a herd of rams with the blade of your own sword. Satisfied by that offering, she will destroy, before long, the evil effects of your dream."

14. At this, the all too merciful King shut his ears and said ; "O mother, is it right that you should say this, at once irrational and immoral ?

15. After all, the life of man is a fleeting show lasting but a day or two. If, on that account, a living being is killed now, my soul will be tainted with horrid sin in lives to come ; and how shall I bring it down upon myself ?

16. For all kings in my family history, firm has been the hereditary faith in the religion of Jina. In that religion, violence is the most heinous of sins and is a source of hellish suffering.

17. In your motherly affection, O mother, never again tell me such words." Ruffled by these words, Candramatī spoke to him again ;

18. "Let my word be disobeyed in this ; let your faith in non-violence remain esteemed. Differently, then, you will propitiate the goddess by sacrificing a cock made of rice-flour."

19. As the mother was saying these words again and again, the King understood her keenness and reflected : "I said one thing ; and another thing is the upshot now. What shall I do in the matter ?

20. It is wrong to disobey a mother's bidding ; and equally bad is the slaughter of living beings. Alas, what a fate that my mind should be placed in a quandary like this !

21. Causing injury to a replica of a sentient being is virtually injuring the sentient prototype itself. Inflow of karma through strange channels has been preached by the foremost ascetics. "

22. Notwithstanding this wisdom dawning within himself, the King, overcome by regard for his mother, went like a skeptic (i. e. non-Jaina) to the temple of Caṇḍikā, along with his mother.

23. On Tuesday, which synchronised with the eighth of the bright half of Āśvayuja, the King devotedly circumambulated Caṇḍikā thrice and saluted the goddess, bowing down his head.

24. There he got the artificial cock, whose painted beauty had tempted a spirit to reside therein, and slaughtered it with the blade of his own sword, saying:—"O goddess, please derive satisfaction ; this sacrifice is meant for thee. "

25. Seeing the beheaded bird giving out a shriek at a short distance, the King threw down the sword in his hand and grieved. Folly, to be sure, brings anguish to the good-natured.

26. Alas, I am undone by the good-looking Amṛtamati ! Alas, I am undone by the bidding of my mother ! Alas, I am to live long in Hell ! Alas, I am bound by the unbreakable bond of rebirth !

27. How strange that this artificial bird itself should moan out aloud when hit by the sword ! Alas, 36. Therein, as people saw, they had (once) enjoyed for long their empire over the entire earth; therein, again, they were seen feeding on filthy refuse and worms. The fruit of one's own action is difficult to get over in this world !

37. Once, seeing his woman in his own mansion dallying with the paramour, the peacock's memory of its past life returned, and it furiously pecked the paramour's eye until it bled.

38. Being smashed on the head by Amṛtamati, the peacock fell down to the ground in pain. The dog, that had been Candramati in the previous life, caught it (as it fell) and ate it up.

39. The King (Yasomati), unable to forgive its killing his pet peacock, gave the dog a big blow with his diceboard.

40. Seeing both of them dead, the King was filled with sorrow. Good masters are so full of mercy towards their dependents that they do not reckon their lowliness.

41. The peacock that died came to be reborn as a boar bristling with sharp thorns in a big forest teeming with elephants, lions, eight-footed beasts, etc., near the Vindhya mountain.

42. The dog too, after its death, was reborn in the forest as a black cobra. Once, incited by old enmity, the boar killed down the cobra.

43. As the boar was about to move away after feasting upon the black cobra, a tiger, mad with hunger, suddenly pounced upon the boar and killed it.

44. The boar was born again as a red-eyed fish in the river Śiprā, while the black cobra became a violent crocodile therein.

45. As the crocodile was running fast after the fish, its enemy, in order to kill it, it came across the King's female hunchback on its way in the water, and snatching her away, the crocodile went back to its dwelling hole.

46. In a fit of anger, the king of Ujjayinī got the crocodile out of its watery hole through his fishermen and had it tortured unto death in numerous ways like cutting, and burning.

47. The crocodile, so devoured by Death, again took birth as a she-goat in the untouchables' colony of that very city. What filthy spots does not a soul frequent when tipsy with the brandy of karma?

48. The red-eyed fish too came to be caught in a fishing net; and was brought to the King by his men. The King ordered it to be cut and cooked for the ceremonial dinner on his father's death anniversary.

49. The brahmins feasted upon that flesh and pronounced the benediction that Yaśodhara was in heaven. Meanwhile the half-cut fish thought; "Alas, I am here a fish all the time; and where is heaven for me?"

50. Now the she-goat conceived the soul of the dead fish (as an embryo) in her womb, the very she-goat which had been the deadly black cobra, of the colour of dark clouds, in the third birth.

51. Being brought forth as a he-goat and with a body which soon came to possess vigorous youth, the

51. Being brought forth as a he-goat and with a body which soon came to possess vigorous youth, the

he-goat mated freely with the mother-goat itself, overcome by passion.

52. Once, as the he-goat was in the sexual act with the mother, another he-goat came forth suddenly with eyes red in anger and killed it, tearing out its belly with its sharp pointed horns.

53. Again the soul (of the dead he-goat) entered the womb of the self-same she-goat, impregnated with its own semen. The excessive growth of the embryo in the womb caused much weight and pain to the she-goat.

54. Once, the King, who was returning from the forest after a hunt in disappointment, shot down the she-goat casually with his pointed arrow.

55. Seeing the young one of the goat slipping out of the cavity caused by his arrow-shot (in the body of the she-goat), the compassionate King ordered a man-servant of the lowest class to bring it up. Accordingly, the man brought it up.

56. Another time, the King vowed to offer he-buffaloes as sacrifice to the goddess Bhavānī, went play-fully into a forest with a band of followers of his own age, and killed a whole herd of animals.

57. Being extremely glad at the plentiful game he got, the King propitiated the goddess Candikā by sacrificing many he-buffaloes. His cooks removed the flesh of buffaloes to the kitchen for the banquet of brahmins.

58. Seeing it laid out for drying in the sun, the brahmīns said : " This is not fit for the śrāddha ritual, since it is so impure by being touched by crows and dogs.

67. The big buffalo had a back strong enough to bear the heaviest of loads. A rich merchant made it carry his luggage on its back up to the outskirts of Ujjayinī City where he encamped with his caravan, fatigued by the journey.

68. Plunging repeatedly in the waters of the river Śiprā, the fatigued buffalo was trudging about therein, and killed down the King's best horse, Rājahansa, let out to drink water in the river.

69. In his wrath, the King confiscated the entire belongings of that merchant, and had the buffalo instantaneously brought before him, intending to get it tortured to death.

70. The King's men nailed down its four feet (bound together), scalded its belly with (boiling) salt water, and hanging it with its knees up, burnt the buffalo alive, mercilessly.

71. A piece cut out from its roasted part in front, was handed to Yaśomatī's mother, who ate it up at once and said: "I am not at all satisfied by (eating) this.

72. But fetch me the (roasted) thigh of the he-goat tethered in the kitchen." The men did so and the servant-maids spoke to themselves:—

73. "Amṛtamati's body is now odiously stinking and sticky with countless running sores. Yet, why does she keep on eating flesh, which is unwholesome to her health?

74. This woman has committed sinful deeds in the past; only a little of its fruition is her present state. Here in this world itself, man can see with his own eyes the course of karma, ever productive of dire fruit.

flower and glowing feet surpassing the colour of lines of gold on a touchstone.

83. Executing the affairs of state as directed by his ministers who were verily like Br̥haspati (the minister of the king of Heaven), feasting upon wholesome food as directed by his doctors who were oceans of medical knowledge, and scoring a lion's victory on every battle-field, King Yaśomati, the lord of the goddess of imperial sovereignty, ruled the earth for a long time.

Canto IV

1. Once, when the woodland was gay by the arrival of Spring with his company of flowers, the King went out in the company of his wife Kusumāvalī to see the woodland beauty which, like himself, was spreading sweet perfume everywhere.

2. As the King approached the forest, the goddess of Spring appeared indeed to welcome him with words, viz., the sweet and melodious notes of cuckoos, and with radiant smiles, viz., fresh flowers.

3. (Though like creepers) extremely slender, fragrant with flowers, and bedecked with red shoots, viz., corals, the King's women moved to and fro, while the creepers could not give up their immobility at all.

4. The trees were shaking in the wind as if in fear of the prospect of their floral wealth being plundered soon. In their wake, the humming bees seemed to be weeping as it were, out of sympathy due to long association (with them).

5. The creepers now ascended the trees higher up, trees which were unscalable by men because of their heights, as if the creepers wished to safeguard their floral wealth deposited on tree-tops.

6. As the pretty women firmly grasped the branches, cut off bunches of flowers and collected them, there arose the murmur of bees as if it were the moan sent up by the trees in pain.

7. Some of the trees in the forest with their branches in flower, served as swings for the pretty women; and shone as if they were so many celestial trees embraced by nymphs, come into being (on earth) for the first time.

8. Some of the courtesans lay gaily on beds of tender leaves in bower-houses as though they were bursting forth with leaves (also, 'thrills') all over, by passionate longings due to the advent of Love's carnival.

9. On a floral bed made for him at the foot of a tree, the King stationed himself with his darling Kusu-māvalī, right in front, and entertained himself by listening to the Spring songs the ladies were singing.

10. Meanwhile Caṇḍakarman (the headman), on duty of clearing the forest of wild beasts and thieves, chanced to come there; and saw a very great sage, Akampana, sitting at the foot of a lovely tree.

11. He went humbly to the sage endowed with holy mind-concentration and falling at his feet, put him a question. The very nature of a believer (in religion) turns him towards the good.

12. "Closing your eyes and firmly seated, on what, Sir, are you meditating? And what may be the reward of such meditation? Be pleased to tell me. Conduct of persons like your honour cannot be unrewarding."

though there is no outlet for it. It is so even here. Understand this rationally.

21. If you should ask about the soul's nature, here is my answer :—The soul is great, without a beginning, endless, and conscious of self and not-self. Ever does he revolve from one body to another according to the law of cause and effect ('merit and sin'—Commentary).

22. He is the doer of good and evil; and he is the diner of good and evil; and he is the partaker of joy and suffering. When meditated upon with perfected means, he indeed is freed from the dross of karma.

23. Refraining from the bad forms a greater element in the discipline of contemplation upon the soul than even knowledge of the good. Goodness to living beings is the supreme morality. Injury to them is its very opposite, Be sure of this.

24. The soul will ever accumulate merit to himself by devotedly keeping to the religious vows. The wise ones say that morality consists in faith regarding the scriptural categories, viz., the soul, and so forth.

25. Non-violence, truth, non-theft, celibacy, and sense-restraint are the five religious vows. The rewards also have been regularly classified and described by the wise :

26. Non-violence is the best remover of enmity. Truth makes for infallible utterance. Non-theft attracts riches towards itself. And celibacy is the giver of supreme strength.

27. To him who is keeping the vows unflinchingly, comes knowledge of life, both past and future.

The devotees, intent on adding strength to their religious practices, give up honey, wine and flesh.

28. I have already explained to you morality in detail. There is nothing more conducive to the soul's good (than morality.). One who keeps to it, though lacking in religious practices, will never fall into hell, the abode of misery.

29. Men who indulge in irreligious conduct find themselves on the theatrical stage of rebirth, assuming actors' roles of many an animal species and suffering much in their wanderings.

30. These two, who were once Yasodhara and his mother, wandered through many births in intense misery and are now living with you as cocks.

31. If slaughter, practiced only in intent, can bring about such unbearable suffering, what need I say about (the effects of) real slaughter, and what, again, when it is associated with the whole host of sins like untruth ?

32. So, my son, give up violence and so forth. Let the thought, " This is mine life-long ", cease. For, the saints say that the fruit of self-knowledge is just the choice of what is beneficial and rejection of what is baneful. "

33. Harkening to these words of that great sage, he adopted a religious outlook with the five vows. The two cocks, meanwhile, recollected their past births; and both of them crew aloud in joy.

34. At the same time, the King who attempted to exhibit his shooting skill to his beloved, shot the two caged birds with a single arrow that could hit the target guided only by sound.

35. The birds gave up the body with tranquil minds purified by the best (gem-like) religious vows. At the same time, Queen Kusumāvalī conceived them (in her womb) like a mine concealing twin gems of latent lustre.

36. (Later), she brought forth twins. Yaśodhara was born as a boy and Candramatī as a girl. Lovely as the moon and the moonlight, they grew up, delighting the eyes of people like nectar.

37. As they outgrew childhood, the twins took up the pursuit of heigher learning. Once, the King went out to hunt in a forest; and he chanced to see, at the start, a sage absorbed in penance.

38. Getting no game at all that day, the King was returning with a wry face. Seeing the sage again, he said—'This is the impediment to my game' and let loose upon the sage, the whole pack of his five hundred hounds.

39. Seeing that the pack did not kill him because of his power of penance, the King's fury increased and he was about to slay him with his own hands when a merchant, Kalyāṇasuhṛt (lit. 'a good friend'), arrived there casually.

40. Noticing the danger to which the sage was exposed, he spoke to King Yaśomati: "Is it worthy of Your Highness to behave thus towards the great sage who deserves salutation?"

41. Your evil intent about him is itself sure to rob your good in birth after birth. Bearing a mind ever steady in penance, he has won power unconquerable even by Indra (the lord of heaven).

42. Himself without joy, he favours all; knowing no anger, he subjugates all (senses). Always, the conduct of those who are self-realised through knowledge is extra-ordinary.

43. Prostrate yourself, therefore, at his feet in devotion and heed his advice that can purify sin, already perpetrated. In case these words of mine do not appeal to you, it only means that you are intent on your own fall."

44. The King said to him : " How can I bring myself to bow down to this man whose body is unwashed and dirty, until I at least make sure who he is by birth — and that too when he has proved an impediment to my game ? "

45. The merchant replied : " This man is ever pure because sin is suppressed by his right conduct. Purification, in water, of the evil-minded is just like washing from outside a handful of faeces.

46. This conquerer of Cupid is a 'Gaṅga' by birth; and his prowess was deeply felt for long in Kalinga. He is called Sudatta and is now practising penance, freed all of a sudden from the lures of the world.

47. What Your Highness says about his being the cause of the loss of game and sport, is perfectly true. By the power of this holy-natured one, there is no game for hunters in this forest. "

48. The King accepted this counsel of his friend and respectfully fell at the feet of the sage. He said to himself : " Saluting this sage with my head, I shall be washing away my sins once for all. "

49. The sage stopped the King, who had first contemplated murder, from bowing now and recounted.

all that the King had thought in his mind. The wonder-struck King asked the sage respectfully to tell him the fate of his grand-father, etc.

50. Thereupon, the sage granted the King's request and narrated what he saw in his yogic wisdom :
" Your grandfather, by his penance, has attained the sixth supreme heaven, beyond even the fifth one !

51. There he delights, day and night, with zest undiminishing and enjoys pleasures amidst nymphs, adorned with heavenly ornaments and equal to the newly risen sun in radiance.

52. My son, murdering her own husband with poison, your mother became a leprous woman. Even after death, she has fallen into the wretched fifth hell (Dhūmaprabhā) and is suffering agonies there.

53. Your father, Yaśodhara, killed an artificial bird ; and due to that sin, was reborn as a peacock, as a boar, as a fish, as a he-goat twice, and finally as a cock.

54. The mother of Yaśogha's son (i. e. Yaśodhara) too, for the same sin, underwent no less misery gradually as a dog and a cobra, as a crocodile and a she-goat, as a buffalo and a hen.

55. At last, O King, being shot down in the forest by the sound-guided missile of your mighty bow, and dying with pure minds, the cock and the hen have now become the children of Kusumāvalī.

56. Listening to the horrid wanderings of his father through several births, on account of even contemplated violence, the King became afraid of the manifold slaughter of living beings at his hands and his mind leaned more and more towards asceticism.

57. His children too, arrived there as the great sage was narrating their several births; each of them recollected the past lives. Memory revives, indeed, when strong reminders are present.

58. Thereupon, the world-weary King passed on his Kingship to his son (Abhayaruci) and took up asceticism, along with a number of ruling chiefs. So did the wise merchant, Kalyāṇa-suhṛt.

59. The son (Abhayaruci) who had then received kingship from his father, lest there should be any impediment to his father's penance, and who was really averse to sensual joys gave it away to his younger brother named Yāśodhara (II).

60. Thereafter, with his sister (Abhayamatī), also freed from illusion, he approached the great sage Sudatta, relinquished possessions with a blameless mind, and was initiated into the lores of salvation by the monks.

61. We ourselves are king Yāśomati's twin-children who sat at the feet of holy teachers in the forest. Between us two, they call me Abhayaruci and they call this lady Abhaymatī.

62. Today, O Māridatta, we happened to step inside your city and get caught by Caṇḍakarman in the course of our daily rounds to beg food for the great sages who have encamped in the garden outside your city ;

63. Remembering our horrid misery in several births brought about by sham violence itself, we have renounced affluent wealth and become disciples of the great sage (Sudatta).

64. How strange that our attempt at killing a fake bird should result in our horrid wanderings in various lives ! Our minds shudder at the thought even now. But we see Your Highness about to kill a whole host of living beings. We are wonder-struck and filled with pity. ”

65. Listening to their words, the goddess Caṇḍamārī, along with citizens gathered there, felt pleased, even as they could see (with their own eyes). Coming to know that they were his own sister's sons, King Māridatta too felt pleased.

66. The goddess Caṇḍamārī, seen by all people in her visible form, herself attained asceticism and bowed down to the twins, since good sense had dawned on her by their discourse and she now dreaded the miseries of violence.

67. Before becoming invisible, she declared : “ Hereafter, let my devotees worship me only with pure objects like flowers. If anyone should kill (animals), his family shall be ruined. ”

68. Becoming tired of sensual pleasures, King Māridatta made over his kingdom to his worthy son Kusumadatta, and went with unequalled humility, along with the twins, to the holy Sudatta in the forest and became an ascetic.

69. Learning the scriptural lore for long at the feet of that teacher, and practising penance two-fold, viz., the external and the internal, and giving up his body in yogic fashion at the close of his appointed life-span, that king became a god in the third heaven.

70. Knowing that their life-span (on earth) was short, the twins practised penance in the prescribed way, and discarding their bondage of body through yoga became two gods in the second heaven (viz., Īśānakalpa).

71. Endowed there with radiant bodies outshining the brilliant rising sun, and sweetly glanced at by the smiling nymphs in love, they sported in that heaven for long, steeped in supreme delight; remembering all the time their teacher (Sudatta) who was responsible for breaking the vicious circle of their births.

72. Coming to know that these two as well as the king of Yaudheya (i. e. Māridatta), had ascended to heaven by the power of penance, king Yasodhara (II) gave up his sorrow of separation from them and felt extremely glad.

73. Exhibiting his reverence towards elders, his deep love among kinsmen, and his sword in hand against enemies on the battle-field, that King (Yasodhara II) well-read in the vast ocean of polity, sworn to truth, and a victorious lion at the head of battle, held the sovereign rulership of the (goddess of) state.

74. Keeping his subjects of different castes and stages (of life) steadily on the righteous path by his power, crossing the sea of learning by serving attendance on wise elders and by conquering the senses, the Emperor Yasodhara (II), with his great fame touching the other shores of far away oceans, and with a mind well disciplined by the science of polity, enjoyed for long the best fruits of the Three Values (of life).
